he was led to attend the preaching of the Rev. W. Percy, of West Bromwich, where his attention was happily arrested, and he was brought to serious reflection on the evil of his ways and the vanity of the world; and from that time he became a changed man. Encouraged by Mr. Percy, he was induced to enter the college of the countess of Huntingdon, at Trevecca, in South Wales. While a student there, he made great progress in theology, and acquired habits of preaching, which raised him above mediocrity. In the autumn of 1775 he was appointed minister of the Tabernacle. In this new station he became increasingly popular, and the interest that had been so wonderfully excited by the preaching of Mr. Whitfield was to a considerable degree sustained. The prominent station which Mr. Wilks now filled in the metropolis, connected with his superior talents, gave him considerable influence among the religious part of the community, and he took an active part in forwarding many of the benevolent institutions of the age. His name appears among the founders of the London Missionary society, the British and Foreign Bible society, the Village Itinerant society, the Protestant society for the Protection of Religious Liberty, the Irish Evangelical, and many other societies, which he continued to foster and support, till death terminated his labors, on the 29th of January, 1829, in the eighty-fourth year of his age, having been more than fifty years one of the ministers at the Tabernacle and Tottenham-court chapels, London. His remains were attended to Buhill Fields by more than eighty ministers of different denominations, all anxious to testify their respect to his memory.

Mr. Wilks had a brother, whose name was MARK, who for many years was a respectable minister among the Baptists, and pastor of a church in the city of Norwich; he was the author of several tracts, particularly "Athaliah, or the Tocsin sounded, in Three Sermons," 1795, and others, which appeared under the signature of "The Norfolk Farmer."—*Jones' Chris. WILL; the voluntary principle, or the power of choice in an intelligent being. Its office is to determine between motives, i. e. between the conflicting opinions and desires raised in the soul, by different objects, circumstances, law, evidence, authority, sanctions, arguments and persuasions. Hence its exercise differs little from the final judgment of the mind. When man was created, he was fully disposed and freely preferred to do what was pleasing in the sight of God; but by the fall he lost his former disposition to spiritual good; nor has he since, whatever may be his wishes, hopes, and fears, any will to that which is good, until divine grace enlightens the understanding and changes the heart.

"The nature of the will, indeed, is in itself indisputably free. Will, as will, must be so, or there is no such faculty; but the human will, being finite, hath a necessary bound, which indeed so far may be said to confine it, because it cannot act beyond it; yet, within the extent of its capacity it necessarily is and ever will be spontaneous. The limits of the will, therefore, do not take away its inherent liberty. The exercise of its powers may be confined, as it necessarily must, in a finite being; but where it is not confined, that exercise will correspond with its nature and situation."

This being understood, it is easy to perceive that man, in every supposable state, wills only according to the moral condition of his faculties, habits, and affections; that these being wrongly fixed, hold his will in bondage; and that however freely his volitions may flow within their extent, he cannot possibly overpass them. He, therefore, while a sinful, carnal, and perverse apostate from God, wills only according to the nature of his apostasy, which is continually and invariably evil, without strength of purpose to exceed its bounds into goodness, purity, and truth; for otherwise he would will contrary to, or beyond his nature and situation, which is equally impossible in itself, and contradictory to the revelation of God. Hence his need of the remedial power of Christianity.

But the experience of common sense and conscience will always decide, that no man can conscientiously make this excuse for his crimes, that he could not have willed or acted otherwise than he did. The natural benefits or evils arising out of moral or immoral practices are, in fact, so many rewards or punishments, exhibiting the Being who has so constituted our nature as a moral Governor. This part of his government may not be so clearly discernible in individual instances, because much of the happiness and unhappiness attending virtue and vice is mental and invisible. In the case of nations, however, considered merely as bodies politic, the internal sanction of an approving or reproaching conscience, of subdued or distracting passions, can have no existence; and therefore the external sanctions are more uniformly enforced. Hence, whoever carefully examines the dealings of Providence with the human race will admit, that national prosperity has ever kept pace with national wisdom and integrity; whereas, the greatest empires, when once corrupted, have soon become the prey of internal strife or foreign domination.

Again: man is made for society, and cannot exist without it: consequently, all the regulations which are really conducive to the maintenance of civil policy and social order must be regarded as evident consequences of our nature, when enlightened to the rational pursuit of its own advantage; and therefore should be considered as intimations of a moral government, carried on through their intervention. In addition to which, it ought to be observed, that these laws may be regarded in another point of view,—as a most important class of moral phenomena; inasmuch as they virtually exhibit the most unexceptionable declarations of reason on this subject, because they are collected from the common consent of mankind, and therefore rendered, in a great measure, independent of the obliquities of individual intellect, the errors of private judgment, and the partial views of self-interest, prejudice, or passion. But all the laws of civilized nations, both in their enactment and administration, not only presuppose certain notions concerning the freedom and accountableness of man, the merit and demerit of human actions, and the inseparable connexion of virtue and vice with rewards and punishments, but greatly contribute to fix and perpetuate these notions. It is therefore evidently the intention of that part of the moral government with which we are acquainted, to impress these principles deeply on the human mind, and to induce the human race to regulate their conduct accordingly. The laws, then, of this moral government under which we find ourselves placed, and from which we cannot escape, correspond with and corroborate the conclusions deduced from the observation of mental phenomena. And from both we conclude that similar principles of government will be adopted (so far, at least, as man is concerned) in other worlds and in future ages; only more developed, and therefore more evidently free from its present apparent imperfections. Upon this account we look, in another life, for some such general disclosure and consummation of the ways and wisdom of Providence as shall vindicate, even in the minor details, the grand principles upon which, generally speaking, the government of God is at present obviously conducted. WILL OF GOD is taken, 1. For that which he has from all eternity determined, which is unchangeable, and must certainly come to pass; this is called his providential or secret will. (See DECREES OF GOD, and PREDESTINATION.) 2. It is taken for what he has prescribed to us in his word as the rule of duty; this is called his preceptive or revealed will. (See LAW, and MORAL OBLIGATION.)

A question of very great importance respecting our duty deserves here to be considered. The question is this: "How may a person who is desirous of following the dictates of Providence in every respect know the mind and will of God in any particular circumstance, whether temporal or spiritual?" Now, in order to come at the knowledge of that which is proper and needful for us to be acquainted with, we are taught by prudence and conscience to make use of, 1. Deliberation. 2. Consultation. 3. Supplication; but, 1. We should not make our inclinations the rule of our conduct. 2. We should not make our particular frames the rule of our judgment and determination. 3. We are not to be guided by any unaccountable impulses and impressions. 4. We must not make the event our rule of judgment.

1. Unless something different from our present situation offer itself to our serious consideration, we are not to be desirous of changing our state, except it is unprofitable or unlawful. 2. When an alteration of circumstance is proposed to us, or Providence lays two or more things before our eyes, we should endeavor to take a distinct view of each case, compare them with one another, and then determine by such maxims as these:—Of two natural evils choose the least; of two moral evils choose neither; of two moral or spiritual good things choose the greatest. 3. When, upon due consideration, nothing appears in the necessity of the case or the leadings of Providence to make the way clear, we must not hurry Providence, but remain in a state of suspense; or abide where we are, waiting upon the Lord by prayer, and waiting for the Lord in the way of his providence. In all cases, it should be our perpetual concern to keep as much as possible out of the way of temptation to omit any duty, or commit any sin. We should endeavor to keep up a reverence for the word and providence of God upon our hearts, and to have a steady eye to his glory, and to behold God in covenant as managing every providential circumstance in subserviency to his gracious purposes in Christ Jesus. Pike and Hayward's Cases of Conscience, p. 156.—*Hend. WILL WORSHIP; the invention and practice of such expedients of appeasing or of pleasing God as neither reason nor revelation suggests.—Hend. Buck.

WILLARD, (SAMUEL,) an eminent divine, was born in Massachusetts, and received his education at Harvard college, where he was graduated in 1650. He was settled over the Old South church in Boston, and became the most celebrated among his contemporaries in the ministry. In 1701 he was made vice-president of Harvard college, and continued in this office till his death, in 1707. He published a large number of sermons, and a folio volume of divinity.—Davenport; Allen.

WILLET, (ANDREW, D. D. ; ) a learned and laborious divine of the English church, in the reign of Elizabeth. He engaged himself most sedulously, in addition to his professional labors, in digesting the fathers, councils, ecclesiastical histories, the civil and canon law, and other authors. His Synopsis Papismi is his most celebrated work. His character as a minister was pleasant and gentle, rather drawing by persuasion than driving by fear. He was killed by a fall from his horse, in his fifty-ninth year, December 4, 1621.—Middleton, vol. ii. p. 395.

WILLIAMS, (JONN,) a divine and statesman, was born, in 1582, at Aberconway, in Wales, and was educated at St. John's college, Cambridge. After having held several minor but valuable preferments, he was made bishop of Lincoln, and keeper of the great seal, in 1621. Of the office of lord keeper he was deprived by Charles I. on his accession. He was subsequently prosecuted in the star-chamber, and sentenced to a fine of ten thousand pounds, and imprisoned in the Tower. The proceedings were, however, rescinded in 1640, and in the following year he was translated to the see of York. During the civil war he made an ineffectual attempt to hold out Conway castle against the parliament. He died in 1650. Williams was a strenuous opponent to Laud.—Davenport.

WILLIAMS, (ROGER.) This illustrious man, the father and champion of religious liberty, and founder of the state of Rhode Island, was born in Wales, 1599. Of his family we have no account on which we can place dependence. It has been asserted that he was a relative of Cromwell. This may have arisen from his frequent association with him, and the agreement of their opinions on many important points, but we cannot ascertain that he ever claimed any other connexion. In his early youth he felt the vital importance of religion, and the talent he on one occasion displayed in taking notes of a sermon secured him the patronage of Sir Edward Coke. This gentleman enabled him to pursue his studies at one of the universities. On leaving the university, he entered upon the study of law. It was not long however before he directed his attention to more congenial pursuits in theology. Having obtained the necessary qualifications, he was ordained as a clergyman of the established church, and took the charge of a parish; but on account of his liberal principles, and his having embraced the views of the persecuted Puritans, he was obliged to flee from the tyranny of the bishops, and from his native country. He embarked for New England, and arrived at Boston February 5, 1630.

"He was then," says Mr. Bancroft, "but little more than 30 years of age; but his mind had already matured a doctrine which secures him an immortality of fame, as its application has given religious peace to the American world. He was a Puritan, and a fugitive from English persecution; but his wrongs had not clouded his accurate understanding; in the capacious recesses of his mind he had revolved the nature of intolerance, and he, and he alone, had arrived at the great principle which is its sole effectual remedy. He announced his discovery under the simple proposition of the sanctity of conscience. The civil magistrate should restrain crime, but never control opinion; should punish guilt, but never violate the freedom of the soul. The doctrine contained within itself an entire reformation of theological jurisprudence; it would blot from the statute-book the crime of non-conformity; would quench the fires that persecution had so long kept burning; would repeal every law compelling attendance on public worship; would abolish tithes and all forced contributions to the maintenance of religion; would give an equal protection to every form of religious faith; and never suffer the authority of the civil government to be enlisted against the mosque of the Mussulman or the altar of the fire-worshipper, against the Jewish synagogue or the Roman cathedral. It is wonderful with what distinctness Roger Williams deduced these inferences from his great principle, the consistency with which, like Pascal and Edwards, those bold and profound reasoners on other subjects, he accepted every fair inference from his doctrines, and the circumspection with which he repelled every unjust imputation.

"So soon, therefore, as Williams arrived in Boston, he found himself among the New England churches, but not of them. They had not yet renounced the use of force in religion; and he could not with his entire mind adhere to churches which retained the offensive features of English legislation. The magistrates insisted on the presence of every man at public worship; Williams reprobated the law; the worst statute in the English code was that which did but enforce attendance upon the parish church. To compel men to unite with those of a different creed he regarded as an open violation of their natural rights; to drag to public worship the irreligious and the unwilling, seemed only dead like requiring hypocrisy. 'An unbelieving soul is dead in sin;' such was his argument; and to force the indifferent from one worship to another, 'was like shifting a dead man into several changes of apparel.' 'No one should be bound to worship or,' he added, 'to maintain a worship against his own consent.' 'What,' exclaimed his antagonists, amazed at his tenets; 'is not the laborer worthy of his hire?' 'Yes,' replied he, 'from them that hire him.'

"The magistrates were selected exclusively from the members of the church; with equal propriety, reasoned Williams, 'might a doctor of physic or a pilot' be selected according to his skill in theology and his standing in the church.

"It was objected to him, that his principles subverted all good government. The commander of the vessel of state, replied Williams, may maintain order on board the ship, and see that it pursues its course steadily, even though the dissenters of the crew are not compelled to attend the public prayers of their companions.

"But the controversy finally turned on the question of the rights and duty of magistrates to guard the minds of the people against corruption, and to punish what would seem to them error and heresy. Magistrates, Williams asserted, are but the agents of the people, or its trustees, on whom no spiritual power in matters of worship can ever be conferred; since conscience belongs to the individual and is not the property of the body politic; and with admirable dialectics, clothing the great truth in its boldest form, he asserted that 'the civil magistrate may not intermeddle even to stop a church from apostasy and heresy;' that equal protection should be extended to every sect and every form of worship. With corresponding distinctness he foresaw the influence of his principles on so society. 'The removal of the yoke of soul-oppression,' to use the words in which, at a later day, he confirmed his early view, 'as it will prove an act of mercy and righteousness to the enslaved nations, so it is of binding force to engage the whole and every interest and conscience to preserve the common liberty and peace.'

Even here therefore his views touching the limits of ecclesiastical and civil power were so much in advance of the age, that they gave offence, and on his being invited to assist Mr. Skelton, of Salem, the general court of Massachusetts interfered; but the church persisted, and he for a short period remained with them. He was however obliged to withdraw in the course of the summer to Plymouth, where he was chosen colleague with Mr. Smith, the pastor, and remained two years. At this time he took the opportunity of cultivating the acquaintance of Massasoit and Canonicut, two Indian chiefs of the Pokanoket and Narraganset tribes, and seems to have had some thoughts of devoting himself entirely as a missionary to this race. On a renewed invitation, however, he again returned to Salem in 1633, and on the death of Mr. Skelton the year following was chosen sole pastor. He was not long allowed to remain in peace. In July, 1635, he was summoned to Boston by the general court, chiefly on account of that grand principle which has immortalized his name, THAT THE CIVIL POWER HAS NO JURISDICTION OVER THE CONSCIENCE. To avoid transportation to England, he was obliged, in January, 1635-6, to leave his flock, and seek shelter in the territory of Narraganset. After extreme suffering, he purchased land sufficient for his little colony, and divided it among the twelve persons who accompanied him, designing to make this settlement a refuge for all distressed consciences. The town which he founded he called, as a memorial of the divine mercy, PROVIDENCE. The government was established on the principles of a pure democracy. He neglected no opportunity at the same time of improving and elevating the character of the Indians, and by his consistent behavior and Christian conduct obtained a greater influence over them than any other man of his age. By means of this influence, even at the hazard of his life, on two memorable occasions he saved the Massachusetts colony from extinction, thus, in the spirit of Christ, returning good for evil.

Having embraced the principles of the Baptists, and submitted to baptism, Mr. Williams founded the first Baptist church in Providence, in 1638. A short time after, in consequence of a perplexity arising from the misinterpretation of prophecy, he withdrew from church connexion; though his conscience continued tender, and he ardently desired the solution of his doubts. The remainder of Mr. Williams' life was chiefly occupied in the affairs of the colony; in obtaining a charter from England; checking the excesses of faction, which at times threatened its ruin; and raising it to that honorable estimation to which by virtue of its excellent institutions it was entitled. For this purpose he twice visited his native country, and while there published the greater part of his valuable works. With all these cares, we still find him paying attention to his ministerial duties, and in his seventy-seventh year he was still visiting the Narraganset territory, and freely preaching to the native tribes the unsearchable riches of Christ. Thus lived this venerable patriarch, one of the most illustrious, unaffectedly pious, conscientious, forgiving, noble-minded, and disinterested of men—one who, in all his persecutions, cares, and difficulties, maintained with unswerving integrity the liberal and evangelical principles he professed, steadily advancing as far as light was given him—and who has done more for the promotion of civil and religious liberty than any man whose name can be mentioned in the annals of modern history. We can here cite the language of Mr. Bancroft.

"At a time when Germany was the battle field for all Europe in the implacable wars of religion, when even Holland was bleeding with the anger of vengeful factions, when France was still to go through the fearful struggle with bigotry, when England was gasping under the despotism of intolerance, more than forty years before William Penn became an American proprietor, Roger Williams asserted the great doctrine of intellectual liberty. It became his glory to found a state upon that principle, and to stamp himself upon its rising institutions, in characters so deep that the impress has remained to the present day, and, like the image of Phidias on the shield of Minerva, can never be erased without the total destruction of the work. The principles which he first sustained amidst the bickerings of a colonial parish, next asserted in the general court of Massachusetts, and then introduced into the wilds on Narraganset bay, he soon found occasion to publish to the world, and to defend as the basis of the religious freedom of mankind. He was the first person in modern Christendom to assert in its plenitude the doctrine of the liberty of conscience, the equality of opinions before the law; and in its defence he was the harbinger of Milton, the precursor and the superior of Jeremy Taylor. For Taylor limited his toleration to a few Christian sects; the philanthropy of Williams compassed the earth; Taylor favored partial reform, commended lenity, argued for forbearance, and entered a special plea in behalf of each tolerable sect; Williams would permit persecution of no opinion, of no religion, leaving heresy unharmed by law, and orthodox unprotected by the errors of penal statutes. Taylor still clung to the necessity of positive regulations enforcing religion and eradicating error; he resembled the poets who in their folly first declare their hero to be invulnerable, and then clothe him in earthly armor; Williams was willing to leave truth alone, in her own panoply of light, believing that if, in the ancient feud between truth and error, the employment of force could be entirely abrogated, truth would have much the best of the bargain.

"If Copernicus is held in perpetual reverence, because on his death-bed he published to the world that the sun is the centre of our system, if the name of Kepler is preserved in the annals of human excellence for his sagacity in detecting the laws of planetary motion, if the genius of Newton has been almost adored for dissecting a ray of light, and weighing heavenly bodies as in a balance, let there be for the name of Roger Williams at least some humble place among those who have advanced moral science and made themselves the benefactors of mankind."

He died in his eighty-fourth year, at Providence, and was there buried with all the solemnity the colony was able to show. His principal works are, Key to the Indian Language; the Bloody Tenet of Persecution for Cause of Conscience, and Reply to Mr. Cotton; Experiments on Spiritual Life and Health, with their Preservatives; and his work containing the account of his controversy with the Quakers, quaintly entitled, George Fox digged out of his Burrows.—Knowles' Memoir of Roger Williams; Backus' New England; Am. Bap. Mag. for 1820, and 1834; Bentley's Election Sermon; Mass. Hist. Collections; Hunter's Oration, 1826; Judge Story's Plymouth Discourse; and Bancroft's History of the United States, vol. i.

WILLIAMS, (DANIEL, D. D.) an eminent non-conformist divine, was born at Wrexham, in Denbighshire, about the year 1644. He appears to have labored under disadvantages as to his early education, the defects of which he supplied by self-application and diligence. Being naturally of a serious turn of mind, he devoted himself to the work of the Christian ministry; and, at the age of nineteen, became a preacher among the Presbyterians. After officiating in various parts of England, he went to Ireland, as chaplain to the countess of Meath, and afterwards settled as pastor of a church in Dublin. In this situation he continued near twenty years, highly respected and esteemed; and having married a lady of an honorable family, he obtained with her a considerable estate. His attachment to the Protestant cause subjecting him to inconvenience in that Catholic country, he removed to London in the latter part of the reign of James II., and after the revolution he was chosen minister of a Presbyterian congregation in Bishopsgate street. In 1691 he succeeded Mr. Baxter as one of the lecturers at Pinner's Hall chapel; and he continued to officiate there till theological disputes occasioned a separation, and many of the subscribers seceding, established the lecture at Salters' hall, whither Mr. Williams, together with Dr. Bates, Mr. John Howe, and Mr. Alsop, removed as preachers.

In 1692 he published a tract, entitled "Gospel Truth stated and vindicated," against the ultra-Calvinism of Dr. Crisp; and he afterwards added "A Defence of Gospel Truth," &c., &c. These publications subjected him to the imputation of Socinianism, which he indignantly repelled. His wealth and talents gave him much influence among his brethren in the early part of the last century; and he distinguished himself by opposing the bills against occasional conformity, and for imposing the sacramental test on the Dissenters in Ireland, as well as on other occasions. He died January 26, 1715-16.

Besides numerous benefactions for charitable purposes he bequeathed estates for the support of six Presbyterian students at the university of Glasgow; and also his private collection of books, and a sum of money, for the foundation of a public library in London, which led to the establishment of the Red Cross Street Institution, opened in 1729. Dr. Williams' Works were collected and published by his direction, in five volumes, octavo, consisting of practical discourses and tracts, 1738-1750. Aikin's Gen. Biog.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

WILLIAMS, (EDWARD, D. D.) master of Rotherham academy, was born November 14, 1750, at Glanclwyd, near Denbigh. His father intended him for a clergyman in the established church. To this, however, the son became averse, to the no little mortification and chagrin of his parent. In 1771 he became a member of a Congregational church in Denbigh, where he commenced public speaking, and, in a little time, was sent to prosecute his studies at the Dissenting academy at Abergavenny. His first settlement in the ministry was at Ross, in Herefordshire, where he was ordained in 1776; but not liking the situation, he removed in the following year to Oswestry, in Shropshire, where a more extended field of usefulness presented itself to him. In 1781 an application was made to him from lady Glenorchy to receive under his tuition a few young men, destined for the ministerial office, to which he consented, and five were placed under his care. Soon after this, the academy was removed from Abergavenny to Oswestry, where Mr. Williams now commenced the delivery of a course of college lectures, which he continued for about ten years, when he transferred the academy to other hands, and removed to Birmingham in 1792. After spending three years at the latter place, he received an invitation to superintend the concerns of the Independent academy at Rotherham, in Yorkshire, to which station he removed in 1795, and that station he continued to occupy to the period of his death, March 9, 1813.

As a preacher his reputation did not rank high; he was cold and heavy; but he signalized himself as an author in the number, if not the merit of his publications. His Reply to Mr. Abraham Booth, on the baptismal controversy, made its appearance in 1789, in two volumes, 12mo; and in the following year he gave, in four volumes octavo, "An Abridgment of Dr. Owen's Exposition of the Epistle to the Hebrews." In 1804 he superintended an edition of the works of Doddridge; and, two years afterwards, of those of president Edwards, which he accompanied with notes. He was fond of metaphysical disquisitions, and undertook to expound the Origin of Evil, not much to the satisfaction, however, even of his own admirers. In 1809 he published his greatest undertaking, viz. "An Essay on the Equity of the Divine Government, and the Sovereignty of the Divine Grace," which has been abundantly praised by his friends, and the fundamental principles of which even his enemies would scarcely be found hardy enough to controvert; viz. that in the administration of the divine government, the Most High never punishes his creatures but when they deserve it, nor displays his sovereignty but in conferring unmerited favors. This work has reached a second edition. Dr. Williams' character as a minister, and in all the social relations of life, was highly respectable, and his deportment as president of the academy entitled him to the warmest testimonies of approbation from the students. See Life by Mr. Gilbert.—Jones' Chris. Biog. WILLOW; a well-known tree. (See BABYLON, CITY OF.)

WILSON, (JOHN,) first minister of Boston, was born at Windsor, England, in 1588. He was educated at King's college, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship; but was deprived of it for his non-conformity to the English church. After studying law for three years at one of the inns of court, he directed his attention to theology, and was a chaplain in several honorable families. He then settled in the ministry at Sudbury, in Suffolk. In 1630 he came to this country, in the same fleet with governor Winthrop. A church was formed on Friday, July 30, and, August 27, Mr. Wilson was ordained as teacher by the imposition of hands. In 1633, he received Mr. Cotton as his colleague, and after his death Mr. Norton, July 23, 1656. He survived them both. He died August 7, 1667, aged seventy-eight.

Mr. Wilson was one of the most humble, pious, and benevolent men of the age in which he lived. Kind affections and zeal were the prominent traits in his character. Every one loved him, and he was regarded as the father of the new plantation. Yet he partook of the common error of his times, in calling upon the civil magistrate to punish those who were deemed heretical in doctrine. His portrait is in the library of the Historical society. He published, in England, Some Helps to Faith, 12mo.—Allen.

WILSON, (THOMAS, D. D., LL. D.,) an English prelate, distinguished for his learning and piety, was born at Burton, in the hundred of Wirral, county of Chester, December, 1663. From a school at Chester he removed to Trinity college, Dublin, where he took his degrees in arts, and studied medicine, which he abandoned for divinity. In 1686 he was ordained, and obtained a curacy in Lancashire, and having taken priest's orders in 1689, he subsequently became chaplain to the earl of Derby, whose eldest son he attended as tutor during a tour on the continent of Europe. On the death of his pupil he returned to England, and having been nominated by his patron to the bishopric of the Isle of Man, he was consecrated in January, 1697-8. Though the revenues of his see were only three hundred pounds a year, he made them suffice to support the dignity of his station, and to contribute to the comforts of the poor and helpless. He built a new chapel at Castleton, established parochial libraries, and improved the agriculture of the Isle of Man, by introducing corn, horses, cattle, and sheep, from England. This exemplary bishop was so attached to his humble benefice, that he refused the offer of an English bishopric; and such was the public estimation in which his character was held, that during a war with France he procured an order from the French minister that no privateer should commit ravages on the Isle of Man. He died on the 7th of March, 1755. His works were collected by his son, Dr. Thomas Wilson, and published, London, 1780, in quarto. They were also reprinted by the Rev. Clement Crutwell, of Bath, in two volumes, folio; who also edited a splendid edition of the Bible, with notes by bishop Wilson, London, 1755, in quarto. Biog. Brit.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

WILSON, (JAMES P., D. D.,) minister in Philadelphia, was first a distinguished lawyer, and then was for many years the pastor of the first Presbyterian church. He died at his residence in Bucks county, December 10, 1830. His general knowledge and talents, and his usefulness and excellent character, caused him to be regarded as one of the most distinguished men of this country. He published Lectures on the Parables and the Historical Parts of the New Testament, 8vo, 1810; and Introduction to the Study of Hebrew, 1816.—Allen.

WILSON, (ALEXANDER,) the celebrated ornithologist, was born at Paisley, Scotland, and came to Delaware in 1794. Removing to Philadelphia, he became acquainted with Mr. Bartram, the naturalist, and devoted himself to the cultivation of natural history. His great work is the American Ornithology, in seven volumes, quarto, splendidly executed, and very accurate and comprehensive. He possessed considerable taste for literature, and published several small poems of much beauty. He died in 1813. Wilson appears to have been a man of sincere piety, and to have been animated in his great work by Christian principles.—Davenport.

WINCHELL, (JAMES M.,) a valued minister in Boston, was born in Dutchess county, New York, in 1791; was graduated at Brown university 1812; and succeeded Mr. Clay in the first Baptist church in Boston, March 30, 1814. Here he labored successfully, and much beloved, for six years. He died of the consumption, Feb. 22, 1820, aged twenty-eight. He published an arrangement of Watts' Hymns, with a supplement, and two Discourses, containing a history of his church, 1819.—Allen; Am. Bap. Mag.

WINCHESTER, (ELHANAN,) was born in Brookline, Massachusetts, in 1751. Without an academical education he commenced preaching, and was the first minister of the Baptist church in Newton. In 1778 he was a minister on Pedee river, in South Carolina, zealously teaching the Calvinistic doctrines, as explained by Dr. Gill. In the following year his labors were very useful among the negroes. In 1781 he became a preacher of universal restoration in Philadelphia, where he remained several years. He afterwards endeavored to propagate his sentiments in various parts of America and England. He died at Hartford, Connecticut, in April, 1797, aged forty-five. His system is very similar to that of Dr. Chauncy. He published a volume of Hymns, 1776; a plain Political Catechism for schools; a Sermon on Restoration, 1781; Universal Restoration, in four dialogues, 1786; Lectures on the Prophecies, Amer. edit. two vols. octavo, 1800.—Allen.

WIND. The Hebrews, like us, acknowledge four principal winds: (Ezek. 42: 16—18.) the east wind, the north wind, the south wind, and the west wind, or that from the Mediterranean sea. (See WHIRLWIND.)—Watson.

WINDOWS. The method of building both in Euzary and the Levant seems to have continued the same from the earliest ages. All the windows open into private courts, if we except sometimes a latticed window or balcony towards the street. It is only during the celebration of some zeenah, or public festival, that these houses and their latticed windows are left open; for this being a time of great liberty, and revelling, and extravagance, each family is ambitious of adorning both the inside and outside of their houses with the richest part of their furniture; while crowds of both sexes, dressed out in their best apparel, and laying aside all ceremony and restraint, go in and out where they please. The account we have (2 Kings 9: 30.) of Jezebel's painting her face, tiring her head, and looking out at a window upon Jehu's public entry into Jezreel, gives us a lively idea of an eastern lady at one of those solemnities.—Watson.

WINE; (ain, Gen. 19: 32; oinos, Matt. 9: 17.) a liquor expressed from grapes. (See VINE, and GRAPES.)

The art of refining wine upon the lees was known to the Jews. The particular process, as it is now practised in the island of Cyprus, is described in Martini's Travels. The wine is put immediately from the vat into large vases of potters' ware, pointed at the bottom, till they are nearly full, when they are covered tight and buried. At the end of a year what is designed for sale is drawn into wooden casks. The dregs in the vases are put into wooden casks destined to receive wine, with as much of the liquor as is necessary to prevent them from becoming dry before use. Casks thus prepared are very valuable. When the wine a year old is put in, the dregs rise, and make it appear muddy, but afterward they subside and carry down all the other feculences. The dregs are so much valued that they are not sold with the wine in the vase, unless particularly mentioned.

The "new wine," or must, is mentioned, Isaiah 49: 26. Joel 1: 5. 3: 18. and Amos 9: 13, under the name asis. The "mixed wine," mimsa, (Prov. 23: 30, and in Isaiah 65: 11. rendered "drink-offering") may mean wine made stronger and more intoxicating by the addition of higher and more powerful ingredients, such as honey, spices, defrutum, or wine inspissated by boiling it down, myrrh, mandragora, and other strong drugs, Prov. 23: 30. Isa. 5: 22. 51: 17. Rev. 14: 10. "Spiced wine," (Cant. 8: 2.) was wine rendered more palatable and fragrant with aromatics. This was considered as a great delicacy. Spiced wines were not peculiar to the Jews; Hafiz speaks of wines "richly bitter, richly sweet." The Romans lined their vessels, amphoræ, with odorous gums, to give the wine a warm bitter flavor; and the Orientals now use the admixture of spices to give their wines a favorite relish. The "wine of Helbon" (Ezek. 27: 18.) was an excellent kind of wine, known to the ancients by the name of chabibonium vinum. It was made at Damascus; the Persians had planted vineyards there on purpose, says Posidius, quoted by Athenæus. This author says that the kings of Persia used no other wine. Hosea (14: 7.) mentions the wine of Lebanon. The wines from the vineyards on that mount are even to this day in repute; but some think that this may mean a sweet-scented wine, or wine flavored with fragrant gums.—Watson.

WINE-PRESS; (parah, parah, lēnos.) This was in the vineyard, Isa. 53: 3. Zech. 14: 10. Haggai 2: 16. Matt. 21: 33. Rev. 14: 19, 20. The press consisted of two receptacles, which were either built of stones and covered with plaster, or hewn out of a large rock. The upper receptacle, called nab, as it is constructed at the present time in Persia, is nearly eight feet square and four feet high. Into this the grapes are thrown and trodden out by five men. The juice flows out into the lower receptacle, through a grated aperture, which is made in the side near the bottom of the upper one. The treading of the wine-press was laborious, and not very favorable to cleanliness; the garments of the persons thus employed were stained with the red juice; and yet the employment was a joyful one. It was performed with singing, accompanied with musical instruments, Isa. 16: 9, 10. Jer. 25: 30. 48: 32, 33. Figuratively, vintage, gleanings, and treading the wine-press, signified battles and great slaughter, Isa. 17: 6. 63: 1—3. Jer. 49: 9. Lam. 1: 15.—Watson.

WINSLOW, (EDWARD,) governor of Plymouth colony, the son of E. Winslow, was born in Worcestershire, in 1594. In his travels becoming acquainted with Mr. Robinson at Leyden, he joined his church, and accompanied the first settlers of New England in 1620. Possessing great activity and resolution, he was eminently useful in the establishment of the colony. When the first conference was held with Massasoit, he offered himself as a hostage. On visiting Narraganset, in 1623, the king was found extremely sick; but the skillful attendance of Mr. Winslow was the means of restoring him to health. In his gratitude Massasoit disclosed a plot of the "Massachuseuks," which was suppressed by Standish. In the autumn of 1623 Mr. Winslow went to England as an agent for the colony. He went again to England in 1624, and returned in 1625. In 1633 he was chosen governor; he was again elected in 1636 and 1644. Going to England as an agent in 1635, he was thrown into the Fleet prison for seventeen weeks for teaching in the church at Plymouth, and for performing the ceremony of marriage. He exerted his influence in England to form the Society for Propagating the Gospel in New England, which was incorporated in 1649, and of which he was an active member. In 1655 he was appointed one of the commissioners to superintend the expedition against the Spaniards in the West Indies. In the passage between Hispaniola and Jamaica, he died, of a fever, May 8, 1655, aged sixty, and was buried in the ocean.—Allen.

WINTER, (SAMUEL, D. D.,) provost of Trinity college, Dublin, was born in 1603. He was converted at the age of twelve, and contributed much to the advancement of religion and learning, especially in the college, where, owing to the iniquity and distractions of the times, great degeneracy prevailed. He was exceedingly active and industrious for God, and thought no pains too great whereby men's souls might be edified. He was meek and affable in his carriage towards all men, so that his company was pleasing and delightful to many who were averse to his doctrines. He died December 29, 1666, in his sixty-third year.—Middleton, vol. iii. p. 387.

WINTHROP, (JOHN,) first governor of Massachusetts, was born at Groton, in Suffolk, January 12, 1587, and was bred to the law. Having converted a fine estate of six or seven hundred pounds per annum into money, he embarked for America in the forty-third year of his age, as the leader of those persons who settled the colony of Massachusetts, and with a commission as governor. He arrived at Salem, June 12, 1630, and soon removed to Charlestown, and afterwards crossed the river to Shawmut, or Boston. For eleven years he was rechosen governor, for which office he was eminently qualified. His time, his exertions, his interest, were all devoted to the infant plantation. He died, worn out by toils and depressed by afflictions, March 26, 1649, aged sixty-one. He was a most faithful and upright magistrate, and exemplary Christian. In his Journal he kept an exact account of occurrences and transactions in the colony down to the year 1648, which was of great service to Hubbard, Mather, and Prince. Mr. James Savage published a new edition, in two vols. octavo, 1825. Besides adding valuable notes, he collated the former manuscripts with the edition of 1790, and corrected many errors and suggested amendments. Mather's Magnalia, ii. 8—15; Belknap's Biog. ii. 337, 338; Knowles' Memoir of Roger Williams.—Allen.

WINTHROP, (JOHN, F. R. S.,) governor of Connecticut, and the friend of Roger Williams, was the son of the preceding, and his fine genius was improved by a liberal education in the universities of Cambridge and of Dublin, and by travel upon the continent. He arrived at Boston in October, 1635, with authority to make a settlement in Connecticut, and the next month despatched a number of persons to build a fort at Saybrook. He was chosen governor in 1657, and again in 1659, and from that period he was annually re-elected till his death. In 1661 he went to England and procured a charter incorporating Connecticut and New Haven into one colony. He died at Boston, April 5, 1676, aged seventy years. He possessed a rich variety of knowledge, and was particularly skilled in chemistry and physic. His valuable qualities as a gentleman, a Christian, a philosopher, and a magistrate, secured to him universal respect. He published some valuable communications in the Philosophical Transactions. Knowles' Memoir of Roger Williams.—Allen.

WINTHROP, (JOHN, LL. D., F. R. S.,) Hollis professor of mathematics and natural philosophy in Harvard college, was the son of Adam Winthrop, a member of the council, and a descendant of the governor of Massachusetts. He was graduated in 1732. In 1738 he was appointed professor in the place of Mr. Greenwood. He immediately entered upon the duties of this office, and discharged them with fidelity and high reputation through life. In 1761 he sailed to St. John's, in Newfoundland, to observe the transit of Venus over the sun's disk, June 6th, agreeably to the recommendation of Mr. Halley. When the day arrived, he was favored with a fine, clear morning, and he enjoyed the inexpressible satisfaction of observing a phenomenon which had never before been seen, excepting by Mr. Horrox, in 1639, by any inhabitant of the earth. He died at Cambridge, May 3, 1779, aged sixty-four. He was distinguished for his very intimate acquaintance with mathematical science. His talents in investigating and communicating truth were very rare. In the variety and extent of his knowledge he has seldom been equalled. He had deeply studied the policies of different ages; he had read the principal fathers; and he was thoroughly acquainted with the controversy between Christians and deists. His firm faith in the Christian religion was founded upon an accurate examination of the evidences of its truth, and the virtues of his life added a lustre to his intellectual powers and scientific attainments. In his family he devoutly maintained the worship of the Supreme Being. While he himself attended upon the positive institutions of the gospel, he could not conceive what reason any one who called himself a Christian could give for neglecting them. The day before his death he said: "The hope that is set before us in the New Testament is the only thing which will support a man in his dying hour. If any man builds on any other foundation, in my apprehension his foundation will fail." His accurate observations of the transit of Mercury, in 1740, were noticed by the Royal society of London. He published a Lecture on Earthquakes, 1755; Answer to Mr. Prince's Letter upon Earthquakes, 1756; two Letters on Comets, 1759; an Account of several Fiery Meteors, 1765.—Allen.

WIRT, (WILLIAM, LL. D.,) a distinguished American lawyer. He commenced practice in Virginia, in 1792, and after reaping a rich harvest of emolument, office, and fame, in that state, he was appointed attorney-general of the United States, by Mr. Monroe, which office he sustained with eminence and efficiency during the administrations of Messrs. Monroe and Adams. At the close of the latter administration he retired from office, and renewed his professional labors in Baltimore. He died while in attendance upon the supreme court at Washington, early in 1834, in the hope of a blessed immortality.

Mr. Wirt was an exemplary Christian. During his youth, he studied under Rev. James Hunt, a Presbyterian clergyman in Montgomery county, Maryland, of whose kindness, learning, and affability, his pupil ever retained grateful remembrance. These early impressions, however, were soon erased; and, when about twenty-five years of age, he became introduced into a scene of life with which he became intoxicated, and through means of which he was plunged into the depths of dissipation. From this untoward course he was singularly ransomed by divine grace, under a sermon which he heard from the blind preacher, James Waddell, whom he has so celebrated in his British Spy. The sketch there given is often placed in enviable juxtaposition with those of Lefevre and La Roche. He was the author of the admirable Life of Patrick Henry.—Am. Almanac; Seargent's Elogy.

WISDOM; a comprehensive knowledge of things, in their proper nature and relations, together with the power of combining them in the most useful manner. In a moral sense, it signifies much the same as prudence, or that knowledge by which we connect the best means with the best ends. Some, however, distinguish wisdom from prudence thus: wisdom leads us to speak and act what is most proper; prudence prevents our speaking or acting improperly. A wise man employs the most proper means for success; a prudent man the safest means for not being brought into danger. Both are united in "being wise unto salvation," 2 Tim. 3: 15.

Spiritual wisdom consists in the knowledge and fear of God. It is beautifully described by St. James, as "first pure, peaceable, gentle, easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality, and without hypocrisy," James 3: 17. (See Devotion; RELIGION.)—Hend. Buck.

WISDOM OF GOD, is that grand attribute of his nature by which he knows and orders all things for the promotion of his glory and the good of his creatures. This appears in all the works of his hands; (Ps. 104: 24.) in the dispensations of his providence; (Ps. 97: 1, 12.) in the work of redemption; (Eph. 3: 10.) in the government and preservation of his church in all ages, Ps. 107: 7. This doctrine should teach us admiration; (Rev. 15: 3, 4.) trust and confidence, (Ps. 9: 10.) prayer; (Prov. 3: 5, 6.) submission; (Heb. 12: 9.) praise, Ps. 103: 1, 4. WISE, (JOHN,) minister of Ipswich, Massachusetts, was graduated at Harvard college, in 1673, and was soon ordained at Chebacco, in Ipswich. Being a chaplain in the unhappy expedition against Canada in 1690, he distinguished himself not only by the pious discharge of the sacred office, but by his heroic spirit and martial skill. When several ministers signed proposals, in 1705, for establishing associations which should be intrusted with spiritual power, he exerted himself with effect to avert the danger which threatened the Congregational churches. Mr. Wise died April 8, 1725, aged seventy-three. He was enriched with the excellencies of nature and of religion, uniting a graceful form and majestic aspect, to a lively imagination and sound judgment, and to incorruptible integrity, unshaken fortitude, liberal charity, and fervent piety. His attachment to civil and religious liberty was zealous and firm. He was a learned scholar and eloquent orator. In his last sickness he expressed a deep sense of his own unworthiness in the sight of heaven, and a conviction that he needed the divine mercy and was entirely dependent on the free grace of God in Christ Jesus. He published the Churches' Quarrel Espoused, 1710; and a Vindication of the Government of the New England Churches, about the year 1717 or 1718. It was reprinted in 1772.—Allen.

WISHART, (GEORGE,) a Scotch Protestant martyr, was born at the commencement of the sixteenth century. Little is known of his early life; but he is said to have embraced the Protestant faith while travelling in Germany; and to have resided for some years at Cambridge; and to have taught at Benedict college. In 1544 he returned to his native land, and exerted himself zealously in preaching the doctrines of the Reformation. In 1546 he was seized by cardinal Beaton, was brought to trial, and was mercilessly condemned to the flames.—Davenport; Fox.

WITCHCRAFT; a juggling pretence of supernatura knowledge or power gained by entering into a compact with the inhabitants of the spiritual world, called "familiar spirits." Sad mistakes on this subject have been made, which have led to sanguinary scenes. Hence some have denied the existence of witchcraft altogether. But this arises usually from confounding the fact of such pretences having been made, with the reality of the thing pretended. The latter may be doubted, but not the former. That such persons have been found among men seems evident from the Scriptures, Deut. 18: 10. Exod. 22: 18. Gal. 5: 20. Lev. 19: 13. 20: 6. The inconsistency of holding such persons in estimation, or having recourse to fortune-tellers, diviners, charmers, and such like, appears in this: 1. It is imitating the heathens, and giving countenance to the foolish superstition and absurd practices of pagans. 2. Such characters are held in abhorrence by the Lord, and their very existence forbidden, Lev. 20: 6. Exod. 20: 18. 3. He threatens to punish those who consult them, Lev. 20: 6. 4. It is wrong to have any thing to do with them, as it is setting an awful example to others. 5. It is often productive of the greatest evils, deception, discord, disappointment, and incredible mischief. Hawkins' Two Sermons on Witchcraft; Ency. Brit.; Moore's Theological Works, pp. 240, 251; Hutchinson on Witchcraft; Upham's Lectures on do.—Ency. Am.; and especially Sir Walter Scott on Demonology and Witchcraft.—Hend. Buck.

WITHERSPOON, (JOHN, D. D., LL. D.,) was a branch of a very respectable family, which had long possessed considerable landed property in the east of Scotland. He was lineally descended from John Knox, well known as a distinguished instrument of spreading the reformed religion in that part of the United Kingdom. He was born February the 5th, 1722, and his father was at that time minister of the parish of Yester, about eighteen miles from Edinburgh. His father was a worthy man, eminent not only for piety but for literature, and for a habit of extreme accuracy in all his writings and discourses. Any propensity, when it has once become characteristic of a race, is peculiarly apt to be propagated by the influence of early associations. The father's example, therefore, may be supposed to have contributed not a little to form in the son that taste and love of correctness, united with a dignified simplicity, for which he was so much and so justly distinguished through the whole of his life. Young Witherspoon was very early sent to the public school at Haddington, where his father spared no expense in his education. He had been at that seminary but a little while when he attracted particular notice; he was distinguished for assiduity in his studies, for soundness of judgment, and for clearness and quickness of conception among his school-fellows, many of whom have since filled some of the highest stations in the literary and political world. At the age of fourteen he was removed to the university of Edinburgh, where he continued attending the different professors, with a great degree of credit in all the branches of learning, until the age of twenty-one, when he was licensed to preach the gospel. When a student at the Divinity hall, his character stood remarkably high for his taste in sacred criticism, and for a precision in thinking, and a perspicuity of expression, rarely attained at so early a period.

From Beith, where he was first settled, he soon received a call to the large and flourishing town of Paisley, so celebrated for its various and excellent manufactures. There he resided, enjoying great reputation, and labored in the work of the Lord with uncommon success. During his residence at Paisley he was invited to Dublin, in Ireland to take the charge of a numerous and respectable congregation in that city. He was also invited to Rotterdam, in the United Provinces, and to the town of Dundee, in his own country; but he could not then be induced to quit such a sphere of comfort and usefulness as Paisley afforded him. He rejected also, in the first instance, the invitation of the trustees of the college of New Jersey, in America. But, urged by all the friends whose judgment he most respected and whose friendship he most valued; hoping, too, that his sacrifice might be more than repaid by his being made peculiarly useful in promoting the cause of Christ and the interests of learning in the new world; and knowing that Jersey college had been consecrated, from its foundation, to those great objects to which he had devoted his life, he consented, on a second application. And true it is, that after the election of Dr. Witherspoon to the presidency, learning received an extension that was not known before in the American seminaries. He introduced into their philosophy all the most liberal and modern improvements of Europe; he made the philosophical course embrace the general principles of policy and public law; he incorporated with it sound and rational metaphysics, equally remote from the doctrines of fatality and contingency, from the barrenness of the schools, and from the excessive refinements of those contradictory but equally absurd and impious classes of sceptics, who either wholly deny the existence of matter, or maintain that nothing but matter exists in the universe. The number of men of distinguished talents in the different professions who received the elements of their education under Dr. Witherspoon, demonstrate how eminent his services were to the college of New Jersey.

Dr. Witherspoon continued directing the institution of which he was president, with increasing success, till the commencement of the American war; but that calamitous event suspended his functions and dispersed the college. He then entered upon a new scene, and appeared in a new character. Still, however, he shone with his usual lustre. Knowing his distinguished abilities, the citizens of New Jersey elected him as one of the most proper delegates whom they could send to that convention which formed their republican constitution. In this convention he appeared, to the astonishment of all the professors of the law, as profound a civilian as he confessedly was a philosopher and divine. From the revolutionary committees and conventions of the state he was sent, early in the year 1776, as a representative of the people of New Jersey to the congress of United America. He was seven years a member of that body, which, in the face of innumerable difficulties and dangers, secured to Americans the establishment of their independence. Dr. Witherspoon was always firm amidst the most gloomy and formidable aspects of public affairs, and always discovered the greatest presence of mind in the most embarrassing situations.

Towards the close of life, however, he felt and gratified an inclination to retire from the political scene on which he had long acted with uncommon dignity and usefulness. He withdrew, in a great measure, from the exercise of all the public functions that were not immediately connected with the duties of his sacred office. For more than two years before his death he suffered the loss of his sight, which continued to hasten the progress of his other disorders. These he bore with a patience and a cheerfulness rarely to be met with, even in those eminent for wisdom and piety. His activity of mind and anxiety to be useful would not permit him, even in this depressing situation, to desist from the exercise of his ministry and his duties in the college. He was frequently led into the pulpit, both at home and abroad, during his blindness; and he always acquitted himself, even then, in his usually accurate, impressive, and excellent manner. He had the felicity of enjoying the full use of his mental powers to the very last. He died on November the 15th, 1794, in the seventy-third year of his age. The college of New Jersey lost in him a most distinguished president, America one of her ablest politicians, and the church of Christ one of her most valuable ministers. His writings, which are well known, were collected into four volumes, octavo, and of which a uniform edition was published at Philadelphia in 1803, and at Edinburgh in 1804, in nine vols. 12mo. See Life of Dr. Witherspoon prefixed to his Works.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

WITNESS; one who bears testimony to any thing; thus it is said, you are a witness, a faithful witness, a false witness, God is witness, &c. Christ is the faithful witness; (Rev. 1: 5.) the martyr of truth and justice.

The law appointed that two or three witnesses should be credited in matters of judicature; but not one witness only, Deut. 17: 6, 7. It condemned a false witness to the same punishment as that to which he would have subjected his neighbor, Deut. 19: 16—19.

The prophets are the witnesses of our belief; they witness the truth of our religion, Heb. 12: 1. The apostles are still further witnesses of the coming, the mission, and the doctrine of Christ. If Christ is not risen, says Paul, then are we false witnesses, 1 Cor. 15: 15. We are witnesses, says Peter, (Acts 10: 39: 41.) of all that Jesus did in Judea; and when the apostles thought fit to put another in the place of Judas, (Acts 1: 22.) they selected one who had been a witness of the resurrection along with themselves. (See TESTIMONY; RESURRECTION OF CHRIST; and books referred to under CHRISTIANITY.)—Calmet.

WITSIUS, (HERMANUS, D. D.) a very learned and eminent divine of North Holland, was born at Enckhuisen, in 1626. He was trained to the study of divinity, and so distinguished himself by his uncommon abilities and learning, that he was chosen professor of it, first at Franeker, afterwards at Utrecht, and, lastly, at Leyde. He applied himself successfully to the study of the oriental languages, and was ignorant of no branch of learning which is necessary to form a sound divine. He died at Leyden in 1708, after having published several important works, which show great judgment, great learning, and great piety. "The Economy of the Covenants" has been translated into our language, in three volumes, octavo, and is highly prized; also his "Dissertations on the Apostles' Creed," in two volumes, octavo. But the work in which he has displayed the most extensive learning is his "Egyptiaca et Decaphylon," quarto, in which he has drawn a comparison between the Hebrew ritual and that of the ancient Egyptians. He also published "Canon Chronicus," and "De Legibus Hebræorum."—Jones' Chris. Biog.

WOE. "Woe to such an one!" is, in our language, a threat, or imprecation, which comprises a wish for some calamity, natural or judicial, to befall a person; but this is not always the meaning of the word in Scripture. We have the expression, "Woe is me," that is, alas, for my sufferings! and, "Woe to the women with child, and those who give suck," &c., that is, alas, for their redoubled sufferings in times of distress! It is also more agreeable to the gentle character of the compassionate Jesus to consider him as lamenting the sufferings of any, whether person, or city, than as imprecating, or even as denouncing, them; since his character of judge formed no part of his mission. If, then, we should read, "Alas, for thee, Chorazin! alas, for thee, Bethsaida!" we should do no injustice to the general sentiments of the place, or to the character of the person speaking. This, however, is not the sense in which woe is always to be taken; as when we read, "Woe to those who build houses by unrighteousness, and cities by blood;" woe to those who are "rebellious against God," &c. in numerous passages, especially of the Old Testament. The import of this word, then, is in some degree qualified by the application of it: where it is directed against transgression, crime, or any enormity, it may be taken as a threatening, a malediction; but, in the words of our Lord, and where the subject is suffering under misfortunes, though not extremely wicked, a kind of lamentatory application of it should seem to be most proper. Campbell's Dissertations.—Calmet.

WOLF; (zab, in Arabic, zeb, Gen. 49: 27. Isa. 11: 6. 65: 25. Jer. 5: 6. Ezek. 22: 27. Zeph. 3: 3. Hab. 1: 8; lukos, Matt. 7: 15. 10: 16. Luke 10: 3. John 10: 12. Acts 20: 29. Eccl. 13: 17.) M. Majus derives it from the Arabic word zab or daaba, "to frighten"; and hence, perhaps, the German word dieb, "a thief." The wolf is a fierce, strong, cunning, mischievous, and carnivorous quadruped; externally and internally so nearly resembling the dog, that they seem modelled alike, yet have a perfect antipathy to each other. The Scripture observes of the wolf, that it lives upon rapine; is violent, bloody, cruel, voracious, and greedy; goes abroad by night to seek its prey, and is a great enemy to flocks of sheep. Indeed, this animal is fierce without cause, kills without remorse, and by its indiscriminate slaughter seems to satisfy its malignity rather than its hunger. The wolf is weaker than the lion or the bear, and less courageous than the leopard; but he scarcely yields to them in cruelty and rapaciousness. His ravenous temper prompts him to destructive and sanguinary depredations; and these are perpetrated principally in the night. This circumstance is expressly mentioned in several passages of Scripture.—Watson.

WOLFE, (CHARLES,) an illustrious young Irish divine and poet, was born in 1791, at Dublin; was educated at Trinity college, Dublin; obtained the curacy of Ballyclog, which he exchanged for that of Castle Caulfield; and after a short but brilliant course of evangelical usefulness, died of consumption, in February, 1823. He wrote the well-known Ode on the Death of Sir John Moore, beginning with "Not a drum was heard;" pronounced by Byron the finest ode of modern times. Since his lamented decease there has been published an admirable volume of his Life, Sermons, and Remains, which see.—Davenport.

WOLLASTON, (WILLIAM,) an ethical and theological writer, was born in 1659, at Cotton Clanford, in Staffordshire; was educated at Sidney college, Cambridge; took orders; but obtained an independence, which turned his views from church preferment; and died in 1724. His principal work is the Religion of Nature Delineated.—Davenport.

WOMAN, was created as a companion and assistant to man; (see ADAM;) equal to him in authority and jurisdiction over the animals; but after the fall, God subjected her to the government of man: (Gen. 3: 16.) "Thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee." In addition to the duties prescribed by the law, common to men and women, certain regulations were peculiar to this sex; as those respecting legal uncleannesses during their ordinary infirmities, those attending child-bearing, &c. The law did not allow any action of the woman against the man; but it permitted the husband to divorce his wife, and to cause her to be stoned, if she violated her conjugal vow, &c.

If a married woman made a vow of whatever nature, she was not bound by it if her husband forbade it the same day. But if he stayed till the next day before he contradicted it, or knowing the thing, if he held his peace, she was then supposed to consent to it; and the woman was bound by her vow, Num. 30: 7, &c. See 1 Cor. 7: 2, &c. for the duties of women towards their husbands. He apostle would have them submissive, as to Christ, Eph. 5: 2. He forbids them to speak or teach in the church; or to appear there with their heads uncovered, or without veils, 1 Cor. 11: 5, 14: 34. He does not allow women to teach, or to domineer over their husbands, but would have them continue in submission and silence. (See VERB.) He adds, that the woman shall be saved in bearing and educating her children, if she bring them up in faith, charity, sanctity, and a sober life. See Tit. 2: 4, 5, and 1 Pet. 3: 1—3, where modesty is recommended to them, with great care in avoiding superfluous ornaments and unnecessary finery.—Calmet.

WOMB. The fruit of the womb is children, (Gen. 30: 2.) whom the Psalmist (127: 3.) describes as the blessing of marriage.—Calmet.

WONDER; any thing which causes surprise by its strangeness. "It expresses," says Mr. Cogan, "an embarrassment of the mind after it is somewhat recovered from the first percussion of surprise. It is the effect produced by an interesting subject which has been suddenly presented to the mind, but concerning which there are many intricacies, either respecting the cause or manner in which the event has taken place, motives of extraordinary conduct," &c. How it differs from admiration, see ADMIRATION. Brown's Philosophy.—Hend. Buck.

WOOD, (ANTHONY,) a biographer and antiquary, was born in 1632, at Oxford, and was educated at Merton college. The perusal of some works on heraldry, and of Dugdale's Warwickshire, inspired in him a taste for antiquarian lore. His History and Antiquities of Oxford, which was translated into Latin by Dr. Fell, appeared in 1674, and his Athenæ Oxonienses was published in 1691.

An attack upon lord Clarendon, in the last of these works, subjected him to a sentence of expulsion, and his Jacobitical prejudices rendered him an object of hatred to the whig party. He died in 1695.—Davenport.

WOOLSTON, (THOMAS,) a deistical writer, was born in 1669, at Northampton, and was educated at Sidney college, Cambridge. The perusal of the writings of Origen gave him a fondness for allegorizing, and his first work, the Old Apology for the Truth of the Christian Religion revived, was meant to prove that the actions of Moses were typical of Christ and the church. He gradually became a deist, and at length his Six Discourses on Miracles, and his Defence of the Discourses, brought upon him a prosecution for blasphemy, and he was fined and imprisoned. He died within the rules of the king's bench, in 1732.—Davenport.

WORCESTER, (SAMUEL, D. D.) an eminent minister in Salem, (Mass.) was born in Hollis, New Hampshire, November 1, 1771; was graduated at Dartmouth college in 1795; and ordained at Fitchburg, Massachusetts, September 27, 1797. He was installed the pastor of the Tabernacle church in Salem, April 20, 1803. At the institution of the Foreign Mission Society, in 1810, he was chosen recording secretary, and upon him devolved the chief care and labor of the society. In 1817, when Mr. Cornelius was settled as his colleague, he was allowed to devote three quarters of his time to the missionary cause. In 1820, in a state of feeble health, he visited the missionary stations at the south. At Brainerd, a missionary station among the Cherokees, he died, June 7, 1821, aged forty-nine, in the blessedness of Christian hope.

Multitudes in this world of selfishness toil only for themselves; he toiled incessantly for the good of others and for the kingdom of Jesus Christ. He was conspicuous for a cool, sound judgment; was distinguished as a writer; and enjoyed in a high degree the confidence of the churches. During his ministry in Salem two hundred and eighty-five were added to the church. His wisdom and talents are seen in the ten first annual reports of the board of which he was the secretary. He published, among other things, Sermons on Future Punishment, 1800; Discourses on the Perpetuity of the Covenant with Abraham, 8vo., 1805; Letters to T. Baldwin, on Baptism, 1807; Letters to W. E. Channing, on Unitarianism, 1815, Christian Psalmody, 1815; and a valuable Sermon on the Practical Uses of the Doctrine of the Trinity.—Allen.

WORD. Mr. Taylor has the following remarks on the different applications of the terms rema and logos, both of which are translated word, in the New Testament.

We do not find that rema is ever personified, or that personal actions are attributed to the term, but, generally speaking, when relating to events, the force of our English word facts, unquestionable facts, is intended; in other cases, authority, influence, promise, or power.

The word logos imports simple speech; that by which the party hearing it may be instructed; also, written information, that by which the reader may be edified: (Acts 1: 1.) "The former treatise (logos) I have made." Also commandments, (John 8: 55. Rom. 13: 9. 1 Thess. 4: 15. et al.) prophecy, promises, disputes, threatenings, evil speakings, and, in short, whatever is the subject of words, whether good or bad. Hence, teaching in all its branches; hence teacher, instructor, wisdom; hence heavenly wisdom, the heavenly teacher, the heavenly instructor, &c. And hence this word, logos, is personified, and personal actions are attributed to it.

The following extracts are from Bruce's Travels in Abyssinia. There is at court, he says,

"An officer, named Kal Hatzé, who stands always upon steps at the side of the lattice window, where there is a hole covered in the inside with a curtain of green taffeta; behind this curtain the king sits." (Vol. iv. p. 76.) Formerly, his face was never seen, nor any part of him, excepting, sometimes, his foot. He sits in a kind of balcony, with lattice windows and curtains before him. Even yet he covers his face on audiences, or public occasions, and when in judgment. On cases of treason he sits within his balcony, and speaks through a hole in the side of it, to an officer called Kal Hatzé, "the voice or word of the king," by whom he sends his questions, or any thing else that occurs, to the judges, who

It may now be considered as hardly bearing a question, whether the ancient Jewish writers (Philo included) derived this idea, or mode of speech, from the heathen; or from the customs and manners of the kings of the East, and those of their own country in particular. Shall we not hereafter acquit the evangelists from adopting the mythological conceptions of Plato? Rather did not Plato adopt eastern language; and is not the custom still retained in the East? See all accounts of an ambassador's visit to the grand seignior; who never himself answers, but directs his vizier to speak for him. So in Europe the king of France directs his keeper of the seals to speak in his name; and so the lord chancellor in England prologues the parliament, expressing his majesty's pleasure, and using his majesty's name, though in his majesty's presence: q. d. the British Kal Hatzé.—Calmet.

WORDSWORTH, (WILLIAM), was born in 1770, at Cocker-mouth, in Cumberland, England. He graduated from St. John's college, Cambridge, about the year 1787, and soon after became intimate with Coleridge, with whom he passed much time in literary and other pursuits. He is the celebrated founder of what is called the lake school of poetry, and is also entitled to the far more honorable appellation of Christian poet. The finer productions of his muse are characterized by the union of deep feeling with profound thought, a power of observation which makes him familiar with all the loveliness and wonders of the world within and around us, and an imagination capable of inspiring all objects with poetic life. His diction is lofty, sustained, and impassioned, when he is not led astray by his attempts to extend the language of ordinary life to the subjects of poetry.—Encyc. Amer.

WORKS, Good, are those actions which spring from pure principles, and are conformable to truth, justice, and propriety; whether natural, civil, relative, moral, or religious. The phrase is often used of acts of charity.

The qualities of a good work in the scriptural sense of the terms, are, 1. That it be according to the will of God. 2. That it spring from love to God, 1 Tim. 1: 5. 3. That it be done in faith, Rom. 14: 23. 4. That it be done to the glory of God, 1 Cor. 10: 31. Phil. 1: 11. The causes of good works are, 1. God himself, Heb. 13: 21. 2. Union to Christ, Eph. 2: 10. 3. Through faith, Heb. 11: 4, 6. 4. By the word and Spirit, Luke 8: 15. Isa. 3: 3. 2 Tim. 3: 16. As to the nature and properties of good works in this world: 1. They are imperfect, Eccl. 7: 20. Rev. 3: 2. 2. Not meritorious, Tit. 3: 5. Luke 17: 10. 3. Yet found only in the regenerate, Matt. 7: 17. The necessary uses of good works, 1. They show our gratitude, Ps. 116: 12, 13. 2. Are an ornament to our profession, Tit. 2: 10. 3. Evidence our regeneration, Job 15: 5. 4. Profitable to others, Tit. 3: 8. WORLD; the whole system of created things, but particularly belonging to the earth. (See CREATION.)

In some places it is used to designate all its rational inhabitants; or, more distinctively, that great body of them who are not really Christians, whether Gentiles or Jews, profligate or sober, profane or devout. This distinctive use of the term is very frequent in the language of our Lord, and of St. John, John 7: 7. 14: 17. 15: 17, 18. 17: 9, 23.

It is taken also for a secular life, the present state of existence, and the pleasures and interests which steal away the soul from God. In this last sense the Greek terms kosmos and aión, are used indiscriminately; though properly the first relates rather to place, and the last to duration.

The love of the world does not consist in the use and enjoyment of the comforts God gives us, but in an inordinate attachment to the things of time and sense. "1. We love the world too much," says Dr. Jortin, "when, for the sake of profit or pleasure, we wilfully, knowingly, and deliberately transgress the commands of God. 2. When we take more pains about the present life than the next. 3.

When we cannot be contented, patient, or resigned, under low and inconvenient circumstances. 4. We love the world too much when we cannot part with any thing we possess to those who want, deserve, and have a right to it. 5. When we envy those who are more fortunate and more favored by the world than we are. 6. When we honor, and esteem, and favor persons purely according to their birth, fortunes, and success, measuring our judgment and approbation by their outward appearance and situation in life. 7. When worldly prosperity makes us proud, and vain, and arrogant. 8. When we omit no opportunity of enjoying the good things of this life; when our great and chief business is to divert ourselves till we contract an indifference for rational and manly occupations, deceiving ourselves, and fancying that we are not in a bad condition because others are worse than we." Jortin's Sermons, vol. iii. ser. 9; Bishop Hopkins on the Vanity of the World; Pascal's Thoughts; Dr. Stennett's Sermon on Conformity to the World; *H. WORM; the general name in Scripture for little creeping insects. Several kinds are spoken of:—1. Those that breed in putrefied bodies, rimah, Exod. 16: 20. 24. Job 7: 5. 17: 14. 21: 26. 24: 20. 25: 6. Isa. 14: 11; skô'êr, Eccl. 10: 17. 10: 11. 1 Mac. 2: 62. 2 Mac. 9: 9. Judith 16: 17. Mark 9: 44, 46, 48. Acts 12: 23. 2. That which eats woollen garments, sis, Isa. 51: 8; sês, Matt. 6: 19, 20. Luke 12: 33. 3. That which perforating the leaves and bark of trees, causes the little excrescences called kermes, whence is made a crimson dye, hula, Deut. 28: 39. Job 25: 6. Ps. 22: 6. Isa. 44: 11. 41: 14. 66: 24. Exod. 16: 20. Jonah 4: 7. 4. The worm destructive of the vines, referred to in Deut. 28: 39, which was the pyralis vitanae, or pyralis fasciana, of Forskal, the viue-weevil, a small insect extremely hurtful to the vines.—Watson.

WORMWOOD; lagah, Deut. 29: 18. Prov. 5: 4. Jer. 9: 15. 23: 15. Lam. 3: 15. 19. Amos 5: 7. 6: 12; apsinthos, Rev. 8: 11. In the Septuagint the original word is variously rendered, and generally by terms expressive of its figurative sense, for what is offensive, odious, or deleterious; but in the Syriac and Arabic versions, and in the Latin Vulgate, it is rendered "wormwood;" and this is adopted by Celsius, who names it the absinthium santonium Judaicum. From the passages of Scripture, however, where this plant is mentioned, something more than the bitterness of its qualities seems to be intimated, and effects are attributed to it greater than can be produced by the wormwood of Europe. The Chaldee paraphrase gives it even the character of "the wormwood of death." It may therefore mean a plant allied, perhaps, to the absinthium in appearance and in taste, but possessing more nauseous, hurtful, and formidable properties.—Watson.

WORSHIP, (cultus Dei.) amounts to the same with what we otherwise call religion. This worship consists in paying a due respect, veneration, and homage to the Deity, under a sense of an obligation to him. And this internal respect, &c. is to be shown and testified by external acts; as prayers, thanksgivings, &c.

Private worship should be conducted with,—1. Reverence and veneration. 2. Self-abasement and confession. 3. Contemplation of the perfections and promises of God. 4. Supplication for ourselves and others. 5. Earnest desire of the enjoyment of God. 6. Frequent and regular. Some who have acknowledged the propriety of private worship have objected to that of a public nature, but without any sufficient ground. For Christ attended public worship himself; (Luke 4.) he prayed with his disciples; (Luke 9: 28, 29. 11: 1.) he promises his presence to social worshippers, Matt. 18: 20. It may be argued also from the conduct of the apostles, (Acts 1: 24. 2: 4. 24. 6: 4. Rom. 15: 30. 1 Cor. 14. Acts 21. 2 Thess. 3: 1, 2. 1 Cor. 11.) and from general precepts, 1 Tim. 2: 2, 8. Heb. 10: 25. Deut. 31: 12. Ps. 100: 4.

The scriptural obligation of public worship, says Mr.

Watson, is partly founded upon example, and partly upon precept; so that no person who admits that authority can question this great duty without manifest and criminal inconsistency. The institution of public worship under the law, and the practice of synagogue worship among the Jews, from at least the time of Ezra, cannot be questioned; both of which were sanctioned by the practice of our Lord and his apostles. The preceptive authority for our regular attendance upon public worship—is either inferential or direct. The command to publish the gospel includes the obligation of assembling to hear it; the name by which a Christian society is designated in Scripture is a church, which signifies an assembly for the transaction of business; and, in the case of a Christian assembly, that business must necessarily be spiritual, and include the sacred exercises of prayer, praise, and hearing the Scriptures.

But we have more direct precepts, although the practice was obviously continued from Judaism, and was therefore consuetudinary. Some of the epistles of St. Paul are commanded to be read in the churches. The singing of psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs is enjoined as an act of solemn worship to the Lord; and St. Paul cautions the Hebrews that they “forsake not the assembling of themselves together.” The practice of the primitive age is also manifest from the epistles of St. Paul. The Lord’s supper was celebrated by the body of believers collectively; and this apostle prescribes to the Corinthians regulations for the exercises of prayer and prophesying, “when they came together in the church.”—the assembly. The steadiness and order of these holy offices in the primitive church, appear also from the apostolic epistle of Clement of Rome:—“We ought also, looking into the depths of the divine knowledge, to do all things in order, whatsoever the Lord hath commanded to be done. We ought to make our oblations, and perform our holy offices, at their appointed seasons; for these he hath commanded to be done, not irregularly or by chance, but at determinate times and hours; as he hath likewise ordained by his supreme will where, and by what persons, they shall be performed; that so all things being done according to his pleasure, may be acceptable in his sight.” This passage is remarkable for urging a divine authority for the public services of the church, by which Clement, no doubt, means the authority of the inspired directions of the apostles.

The ends of the institution of public worship are of such obvious importance, that it must ever be considered as one of the most condescending and gracious dispensations of God to man. By this his church confesses his name before the world; by this the public teaching of his word is associated with acts calculated to affect the mind with that solemnity which is the best preparation for hearing it to edification. It is thus that the ignorant and the vicious are collected together, and instructed and warned; the invitations of mercy are published to the guilty, and the sorrowful and afflicted are comforted. In these assemblies God, by his Holy Spirit, diffuses his vital and sanctifying influence, and takes the devout into a fellowship with himself, from which they derive strength to do and to suffer his will in the various scenes of life, whilst he there affords them a foretaste of the deep and hallowed pleasures which are reserved for them at his right hand for evermore. Prayers and intercessions are offered for national and public interests; and whilst the benefit of these exercises descends upon a country, all are kept sensible of the dependence of every public and personal interest upon God. Praise calls forth the grateful emotions, and gives cheerfulness to piety; and that instruction in righteousness which is so perpetually repeated, diffuses the principles of morality and religion throughout society; enlightens and gives activity to conscience; raises the standard of morals; attaches shame to vice, and praise to virtue; and thus exerts a powerfully purifying influence upon mankind. Laws thus receive a force, which, in other circumstances, they could not acquire, even were they enacted in as great perfection; and the administration of justice is aided by the strongest possible obligation and sanction being given to legal oaths. The domestic relations are rendered more strong and interesting by the very habit of the attendance of families upon the sacred services of the sanctuary of the Lord; and the rich and the poor meeting together, and standing on the same common ground as sinners before God, equally dependent upon him, and equally suing for his mercy, has a powerful, though often an insensible, influence in humbling the pride which is nourished by superior rank, and in raising the lower classes above abjectness of spirit, without injuring their humility. Piety, benevolence, and patriotism are equally dependent for their purity and vigor upon the regular and devout worship of God in the simplicity of the Christian dispensation.

*Public worship is of great utility, as,—*1. It gives Christians an opportunity of openly professing their faith in, and love to, Christ. 2. It preserves a sense of religion in the mind, without which society could not well exist. 3. It enlivens devotion and promotes zeal. 4. It is the means of receiving instruction and consolation. 5. It affords an excellent example to others, and excites them to fear God, &c.

Public worship should be, 1. Solemn, not light and trifling, Ps. 89: 7. 2. Simple, not pompous and ceremonial, Isa. 62: 2. 3. Cheerful, and not with forbidding aspect, Ps. 100. 4. Sincere, and not hypocritical, Isa. 1: 12. Matt. 23: 13. John 4: 24. 5. Scripturally pure, and not superstitious, Isa. 57: 15.

We cannot conclude this article without taking notice of the shameful and exceedingly improper practice of coming in late to public worship. It evidently manifests a state of lukewarmness; it is a breach of order and decency; it is a disturbance to both ministers and people; it is slighting the ordinances which God has appointed for our good; and an affront to God himself! How such can be in a devotional frame themselves, when they so often spoil the devotions of others, we know not. *Watts’ Holiness of Time and Places; Kinghorn and Loader on Public Worship; Parry’s, Barbauld’s, Simpson’s, and Wilson’s Answer to Wakefield’s Inquiry on the Authority, Propriety, and Utility of Public Worship; Newman on Early Attendance; Dnigh’s Theology.—Watson; Hend. WORSHIP, DEMON; the worship of a class of spirits which were thought to be superior to the soul of man; but inferior to those intelligences which animated the sun, the moon, and the planets, and to whom were committed the government of the world, particular nations, &c. Though they were generally invisible, they were not supposed to be pure disembodied spirits, but to have some kind of ethereal vehicle. They were of various orders, and, according to the situation over which they presided, had different names. Hence the Greek and Roman poets talk of satyrs, dryads, nymphs, fauns, &c. &c. These different orders of intelligences, which, though worshipped as gods or demigods, were yet believed to partake of human passions and appetites, led the way to the deification of departed heroes, and other eminent benefactors of the human race; and from this latter probably arose the belief of national and tutelary gods, as well as the practice of worshipping these gods through the medium of statues cut into a human figure. WORTHINGTON, (WILLIAM, D. D.), a divine justly celebrated for his piety, learning, and charity, was born in Merionethshire, in the year 1703. At the university, Cambridge, Worthington studied incessantly, and by his genius and industry attracted, as he deserved, much notice and respect.

About the year 1740, Worthington was presented to the vicarage of Blodwell, in Shropshire, and there with zeal and ability preached the gospel to his rustic charge. In 1743 he wrote “An Essay on the Scheme and Conduct, Procedure and Extent of Man’s Redemption; designed for the Honor and Illustration of Christianity;” and to this was subjoined, “A Dissertation on the Design and Origin of the Book of Job.” This work, together with one on “The Historical Sense of the Mosaic Account of the Fall, Proved and Vindicated;” another, containing “Instructions concerning Confirmation;” and “A Disquisition concerning the Lord’s Supper,” attracted the attention of bishop Hare, who presented him accordingly to the vicarage of Llangloddwell, in the county of Shropshire. In 1764, he published a Sermon, preached before the university of Oxford, on the Use, Value, and Improvement of various Readings. In the years 1766, 1767, and 1768, he was at various times engaged in preaching a series of discourses for the lecture founded by the Hon. Robert Boyle, on the Evidences of Christianity, deduced from facts, and the testimony of sense, throughout all ages of the church. These Sermons he afterwards published in two volumes, octavo, and they were widely circulated and highly approved. The fame of his writings, and the excellence of his character, now procured for him the vicarage of Llanrhayader, in Denbighshire, where, as in every former scene of his pastoral labors, he wisely, and kindly, and piously performed his professional duties.

In 1773, he published a work entitled, "The Scripture Theory of the Earth, throughout all its Revolutions, and all the Periods of its Existence, from the Creation to the final Renovation of all Things." In 1775 he also published "Irenicum; or, the Importance of Unity in the Church of Christ, considered and applied towards the Healing of our unhappy Differences and Divisions." The last work which was written by this excellent man was, "An Impartial Inquiry into the Case of the Gospel Demoniacs, with an Appendix, consisting of an Essay on Scripture Demonology;" 1777, octavo. It was in answer to an Essay, by the Rev. Hugh Farmer, on the Demoniacs. This attack of Dr. Worthington called forth a spirited reply, and he prepared an answer, but it was not published till after his death. Worthington spent his last days in the retirement of Llanrhayader, where he lived beloved and respected, and where he died, on the 6th of October, 1778, sincerely and generally regretted. WRATH; great and permanent anger. (See ANGER, and ATONEMENT.)—Head. Buck.

WRATH OF GOD is his indignation at sin, and punishment of it, Rom. 1: 18. The objects of God's anger or wrath are the ungodly, whom he has declared he will punish. His wrath is sometimes manifested in this life, and that in an awful degree, as we see in the case of the old world, of Sodom and Gomorrah, the plagues of Egypt, the punishment and captivity of the Jews, and the many striking judgments on nations and individuals. But a still more awful punishment awaits the impenitent in the world to come; for the wicked, it is said, shall go away into everlasting punishment, where the worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched, Matt. 25: 46. Rom. 2: 8, 9. 1: 18. (See ABIDE; HELL; SIN; RETRIBUTION.)

It has been justly remarked, that those are shallow philosophers who reject the plain popular style of the Scriptures, and attempt to prove that there is nothing in the divine nature which can properly be called wrath, indignation, or avenging justice. For whatever use may be made of these speculations, in excluding from our conceptions of the infinite and holy God every idea which originates in the corruption and turbulence of human passions, it is evident that the moral sentiments and affections must subsist in perfection in the Infinite Mind. (See ATONEMENT.) The best method therefore of addressing mankind is that adopted in the Scriptures. It speaks to the heart; it adapts itself to the nature of man in all conditions; it rouses the conscience through the medium of the imagination; and is thus evidently the most intelligible, impressive, and useful. In a word, it is the style chosen by the only wise God himself.—Head. Buck; Scott's Works.

WRITING. (See LANGUAGES; LETTERS; SCRIPTURE; BOOK; BIBLE.)

WYKEHAM, (WILLIAM of,) an eminent prelate, derived his name from a Hampshire village, in which he was born, in 1321. His parents, though respectable, were poor, and he was indebted for his education to Nicholas Uvedale, lord of the manor of Wykeham, and governor of Winchester castle. Uvedale not only educated him, but made him his secretary, and eventually recommended him to Edward III. By the monarch he was employed to superintend the building of Windsor castle. After having held some minor church preferment, he was raised, in 1366, to the see of Winchester, and in 1367 was made chancellor of England. In 1371, the party of the duke of Lancaster compelled him to resign the seals, and he was persecuted by it for several years. Richard II., however, restored him to his dignities. He died in 1404. New college, Oxford, and Winchester school, were founded by Wykeham.—Davenport.

XAVIER, (St. FRANCIS,) denominated the Apostle of the Indies, was born, in 1506, at the castle of Xavier, in Navarre; studied at Paris; became one of the first and most zealous disciples of Ignatius Loyola; was sent to the East by John III. of Portugal, to propagate the gospel; performed his mission in Hindostan, the Moluccas, and Japan; and was on the point of landing in China, when he died, 1552.—Davenport.

XIMENES DE CISNEROS, (Cardinal FRANCIS,) an eminent Spanish statesman, was born, in 1437, at Torrelaguna, in Old Castile, and was educated at Alcalá and Salamanca. After having filled various benefices, he became a monk of the Franciscan order, and obtained a great reputation as a preacher. In his fifty-sixth year, queen Isabella made him her confessor, and, two years afterwards, he was raised to the archbishopric of Toledo. It was not, however, till he received the express injunction of the pope that he would accept the archiepiscopal dignity, and he continued to preserve the austere habits of a Franciscan. He subsequently became prime minister, and a cardinal, and Ferdinand, on his death-bed, appointed him regent till the arrival of Charles V. He died in 1517.

Few ministers have governed with as much ability and firmness as Ximenes. He was also the patron of learning; founded various academical and other establishments; and employed the most erudite men of all countries to edit the famous Complutensian Polyglott Bible. Mr. Butler in his Reminiscences gives him an exalted Christian character. Butler's Reminiscences.—Davenport.

XENOPHON, a celebrated philosopher, historian, and general, a native of Athens, was born about B. C. 445, and was a disciple of Socrates. After having borne arms at the battle of Delium, and in the Peloponnesian war, he became one of the body of Greek auxiliaries, who fought on the side of the younger Cyrus against Artaxerxes. When the Grecian leaders were treacherously slain, after the battle of Cunaxa, the arduous task of conducting the retreat was intrusted to Xenophon, and he performed it with consummate skill. Subsequently he served under the banners of Thrace and of Lacedæmon. He died at Corinth, B. C. 360. Of his works, the style of which is admirable for sweetness, purity, and perspicuity, the principal are, the Anabasis; the Cyropædia; and Hellenics, or Grecian History. (See CÆRUS.)—Davenport.

YEAR. The Hebrews had always years of twelve months. But, at the beginning, and in the time of Moses, they were solar years of twelve months, each month having thirty days; excepting the twelfth, which had thirty-five days. We see by the enumeration of the days of the deluge, (Gen. 7.) that the Hebrew year consisted of three hundred and sixty-five days. It is supposed that they had an intercalary month at the end of one hundred and twenty years; at which time the beginning of their year would be out of its place full thirty days. It must be admitted, however, that no mention is made in Scripture of the thirteenth month, or of any intercalation; and hence some think that Moses retained the order of the Egyptian year, which was solar, and consisted of twelve months of thirty days each. After the time of Alexander the Great, and of the Grecians, in Asia, the Jews reckoned by lunar months chiefly in what related to religion, and to the festivals; (see Eccclus. 43: 6, 7,) and since the completing of the Talmud, they use years wholly lunar; having alternately a full month of thirty days, and a defective month of twenty-nine days. To accommodate this lunar year to the course of the sun, at the end of three years they intercalate a whole month after Adar; which intercalated month they call Ve-adar, that is, second Adar.

Their civil year has always begun in autumn, at the month Tizri; but their sacred year, by which the festivals, assemblies, and other religious acts were regulated, began in the spring, at the month Nisan. (See MOYSES.)

Nothing is more equivocal among the ancients than the term year; and hence it has always been, and still is, a source of dispute among the learned. Some think, that from the beginning of the world to the one hundred and sixtieth year of Enoch, mankind reckoned only by weeks; and that the angel Uriel revealed to Enoch the use of months, years, the revolution of the stars, and the return of the seasons. Some nations formerly made their year to consist of one month, others of four, others of six, others of ten, others of twelve. Some have made one year of winter, another of summer. The beginning of the year was fixed sometimes at autumn; sometimes at spring; sometimes at mid-winter. Some used lunar months, others solar. Even the days have been differently divided; some beginning them at evening, others at morning, others at noon, others at midnight. With some, the hours were equal, both in winter and summer; with others they were unequal. They counted twelve hours to the day, and twelve to the night. In summer the hours of the day were longer than those of the night; on the contrary, in winter the hours of the night were longest. (See HOVA.)

In some parts of the East, (particularly in Japan, says baron Thunberg.) the year ending on a certain day, any portion of the foregoing year is taken for a whole year; so that supposing a child to be born in the last week of our December, it would be reckoned one year old on the first day of January. This sounds like a strange solecism to us: a child not a week old, not a month old, is yet one year old! because born in the old year. If this mode of computation obtained among the Hebrews, the principle of it easily accounts for those anachronisms of single years, or parts of years taken for whole ones, which occur in sacred writ; it removes the difficulties which concern the half years of several princes of Judah and Israel; in which the latter half of the deceased king's last year has hitherto been supposed to be added to the former half of his successor's first year.—Calmet.

YESTERDAY is used to denote all time past, however distant; as to-day denotes time present, but of a larger extent than the very day on which one speaks. Exod. 21: 29: "If the ox was wont to push with his horn in time past;" Heb. yesterday. "And it came to pass, when all that knew him before time;" Heb. yesterday; "whereas thou camest but yesterday;" or lately, 2 Sam. 15: 20. et. al. freq. "Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, to-day, and forever." Heb. 13: 8. His doctrine, like his person, admits of no change; his truths are invariable. With him there is neither yesterday nor to-morrow, but one continued to-day.—Calmet.

YEZIDES, or JEZIDES; an eastern sect, so called from their founder, Yezid, or Jezid, an Arabian prince, who slew two sons of Ali, Mohammed's father-in-law; for which reason he is considered as a paricide and a heretic, and his followers are detested by all the Mussulmans. M. Le Fevre, (in his Theatre de la Turquie.) in the last century, reckoned there were two hundred thousand of this sect in Persia and Turkey, chiefly in the mountains of Sangara. They are of two sorts, black and white; the former are their monks, or fakirs; the latter dress like the Turks, (with a small distinction,) but are never circumcised, except when compelled to be so by the Mohammedans; whom they hate so much, that when they curse any creature in their wrath, they call it Mussulman. They are more friendly to the Christians, because not oppressed by them. They profess to believe both in the Bible and the Koran, but read neither, and are extremely ignorant. They go in companies, like the Arabians, and often change their residence; but have no places of worship. They are fond of wine, and sometimes call it "the blood of Jesus Christ;" from which it is supposed they use it sometimes religiously; they wish also to be on good terms with the devil, and therefore do not speak harshly of him, but call him "the great chief." Broughton's Diet. in Jezides; Grégoire's Hist. vol. ii. pp. 407—422.—Williams.

YOGEES; Hindoo devotees, the same as the San-Jasis and Sungases.—They practise a variety of self-tortures, and mortify the body in order to merit heavenly felicity, and obtain the immaterial nature of Brahma, the supreme. In the Mahabarat a Yogee is thus defined:—"The man who keepeth the outward accidents from entering the mind, and his eyes fixed in contemplation between his brows; who maketh his breath pass equally through his nostrils; keeping his head, his neck, and his body steady without motion, his eyes fixed on the point of his nose, looking at nothing else around, &c.; he is a Yogee, and is forever blessed."

These Yogees, in the practice of self-devotion, cast themselves down on spikes stuck in bags of straw, walk on fire, pierce themselves with pins, and bore their tongues; but their most famous act of devotion is swinging by means of hooks drawn through their backs and sides, and fastened with ropes to trees, by which they will spin round very rapidly for half an hour or more. And some poor creatures, in order to be sure of going to heaven, (as they suppose,) cast themselves under the wheels of the chariot of Juggernaut, and are voluntarily crushed to death. Sketches relative to the Hindoos; Buchanan's Researches, pp. 16—30; Ward's History of the Hindoos.—Williams.

YOKE. It appears that yokes were of two kinds, as two words are used to denote them in the Hebrew: one refers to such yokes as were put upon the necks of cattle, and in which they labored, Num. 19: 2. Deut. 21: 3. The subjects of Solomon complain that he had made his yoke heavy to them, (1 Kings 12: 10,) and they use the same word; but Jeremiah (27: 2.) made him bonds and yokes of another construction, and fitted to the human neck; which he expresses by another word; most probably they were such as slaves used to wear when at labor; however, they were the sign of service. We read of yokes of iron, Deut. 28: 48. Jer. 28: 13. The ceremonies of the Mosaic ritual are called a yoke, (Acts 15: 10. Gal. 5: 1.) as also tyrannical authority; but Christ says his yoke is easy, and his burden is light, Matt. 11: 29.—Calmet.

YOUNG, (EDWARD, D. D.) the pious and learned author of the celebrated "Night Thoughts," bearing his name, was born at Upham, near Winchester, in the month of June, 1681. He was the son of Edward Young, at that time fellow of Winchester college, and rector of Upham, who was an intelligent and good man. Young received his first education at Winchester college, whence he was removed to the university of Oxford; and, in 1708, was nominated to a law fellowship at All-Souls, by archbishop Tennison. At college he distinguished himself by his attention to his studies, and by his love of learning. On the 23d of April, 1714, he took his degree of bachelor of civil laws; and on the 10th of June, 1719, his degree of doctor in divinity. His college was unquestionably proud of him, no less as a scholar than as a poet; for, in 1716, when the foundation of the Codrington library was laid, Young was appointed to speak the Latin oration. His first poetical production was an Epistle to the Right Honorable George Lord Lansdowne, published in 1712. In 1713, Young had the honor of prefixing some commendatory verses to Addison's "Cato," then first published. Just before the death of queen Anne, "The Force of Religion, or Vanquished Love," was sent into the world. This poem is founded on the execution of lady Jane Grey and her husband, lord Guilford, in 1554. Young's father had been well acquainted with lady Ann Wharton, a lady celebrated for her poetical talents by Burnet and by Wal- ler, and the first wife of the marquis of Wharton. This nobleman did not forget the son of his old friend; and to him Young was indebted for a connexion, by marriage, with lady Elizabeth Lee; a connexion as happy as it was short-lived. In the year 1717, he went to Ireland, in company with the young marquis of Wharton, a character most unworthy of the friendship of Young, and whose patronage was regarded by him as unenviable and disgraceful. In the year 1719, Young published his celebrated tragedy of "Busiris;" and, in the same year, appeared "A Paraphrase on part of the Book of Job." His satires appeared at successive intervals, between the years 1725 and 1728. In that year he collected them into one publication, and prefixed to them a preface. In it he observes, that "no man can converse much in the world, but at what he meets with he must be either insensible, or grieve, or be angry, or smile. Now to smile at it, and turn it into ridicule," he adds, "I think most eligible, as it hurts ourselves least, and gives vice and folly the greatest offence." However discordant these sentiments may appear with the generally mournful strain of his "Night Thoughts," it will at least evince, that whether joyous or sad, to vice he was ever hostile; and in the merry notes of his Satires, and the pensive strains of his "Night Thoughts," he directed against it all the energy of his talents, and all the fervor of his mind. On the accession of George the Second to the throne, Young wrote "Ocean, an Ode." The hint was taken from the royal speech, which recommended the increase and encouragement of the seamen. Prefixed to it were "An Ode to the King," "Pater Patrie," and "An Essay on Lyric Poetry." Soon after the appearance of "Ocean," Young entered into orders; and in April, 1728, he was appointed chaplain to George the Second. In this year he also published, in prose, "A true Estimate of Human Life," dedicated to the queen; and a Sermon, preached before the house of commons, 1729, on the martyrdom of king Charles, entitled, "An Apology for Princes, or the Reverence due to Government." In 1730, he wrote "Imperium Pelagi," a naval lyric, written in imitation of Pindar's spirit, occasioned by his majesty's return from Hanover, September, 1729, and the succeeding peace. Soon after, he published Epistles to Pope, concerning the authors of the age. In July, 1730, Young was presented by his college to the rectory of Welwyn, in Hertfordshire. In the following year he married lady Elizabeth Lee, daughter of the earl of Litchfield, and widow of colonel Lee. Of this lady he was deprived by death in 1741. The work which his genius and his piety have rendered so illustrious, and which, in the opinion of the first writer and critic of his age, "contained some of the best things in the language," was commenced immediately after the death of this lady.

It may, with truth, be said of the "Night Thoughts," that they exhibit a very wide display of original poetry, variegated with deep reflections and striking allusions; a wildness of thought, in which the fertility of fancy scatters flowers of every hue and every color. Their excellence is not exactness, but copiousness; particular lines are not to be regarded; the power is in the whole; and in the whole there is a magnificence like that ascribed to Chinese plantations, the magnificence of vast extent and endless diversity. The charm, however, which extends through the whole, is the beautiful and consistent piety which shines in every page, and which constitutes the burden of every song. His other numerous and diversified productions are all the works of a man of uncommon genius; although, undoubtedly, some have higher merit than others. Young possessed not only great talents as a poet, but as an orator; and in his official character was deservedly and universally popular, though some have expressed fears that his piety was rather theoretical than vital. See Life of Young.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

ZABATHAITES; the followers of Zabathai Zevi, (or Sabatai Sevi,) a celebrated Jewish impostor, who appeared at Smyrna about 1666; and, pretending to be the Messiah, promised to deliver the Jews, and re-establish them in more than pristine glory. Multitudes of his nation were deceived by him, and many of his followers pretended to visions and prophetic ecstasies. At length, falling into the hands of the grand signior, he ordered him to be placed as a mark for his archers, to prove whether he was vulnerable or not; (as he pretended;) to avoid which, Zevi turned Mohammedan. (See MESSIAH.)

His sect, however, survived, and there is said to be still a remnant of them at Salonichi, who, while they profess to be Mussulmans, observe the Jewish rites in secret, marry among themselves, and all live in the same quarter of the city, without communicating with the Turks, except in commerce, and in the mosques.

Zevi, it seems, had also adherents among the Jews of England, Holland, Germany, and Poland, some of which have remained to our own time; and M. Grégoire mentions a musician of this sect who came to Paris so lately as in 1808. H. Adams' Hist. of Jews, pp. 316, 528. Grégoire's Hist. tom. ii. pp. 309—313.—Williams.

ZABIANS, are said to be ancient Chaldeans, addicted to astrology, and to the worship of the stars. (See INOLATRY; CHALDEANS; and MAGI.)—Calmet.

ZACCHEUS; chief of the publicans; that is, farmer-general of the revenue, Luke 19. (See PUBLICAN; SYCA-MORE; RESTITUTION.)—Calmet.

ZACHARIAH, son of Jehoiada, high-priest of the Jews, and probably the Azariah of 1 Chron. 6: 10, 11, was slain by order of Joash, A. M. 3164, 2 Chron. 24: 20—22.

Jerome, (on Matt. 23.) followed by a great number of commentators, believed that this Zachariah, son of Jehoiada, was he of whom our Savior speaks in Matt. 23: 34, 35. But to this opinion three things are objected: (1.) That Zachariah, son of Barachiah, according to the intention of Christ, seems to have been the last of the prophets, or just slain by the Jews, as Abel was the first of the just who suffered a violent death. (2.) That Zachariah, son of Jehoiada, was stoned in the court of the house of God; whereas Zachariah, son of Barachiah, was killed between the temple and the altar. (3.) That though it be true that the Hebrews had often two names, it is hardly to be thought that Christ would here omit the name of Jehoiada, which was so well known, and substitute that of Barachiah, which was not so familiar. Calmet therefore thinks that our Savior points at Zachariah, son of Baruch.—Calmet.

ZACHARIAH, the eleventh of the lesser prophets, was son of Barachiah, and grand-son of Iddo. He returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel, and began to prophesy in the second year of Darius, son of Hystaspes, A. M. 3464 B. C. 520, in the eighth month of the holy year, and two months after Haggai. These two prophets, with united zeal, encouraged the people to resume the work of the temple, which had been discontinued for some years, Ezra 5: 1.

This prophet has been confounded with Zachariah son of Barachiah, contemporary with Isaiah; (8: 2.) and with Zachariah, the father of John the Baptist; which opinion is plainly incongruous. He has been thought to be the Zachariah, son of Barachiah, whom our Savior mentions as killed between the temple and the altar; and this is possible, though no such thing is anywhere said of him.

Zachariah begins his prophecy with an exhortation to the people to return to the Lord, and not to imitate the stubbornness of their fathers. He foretells very distinctly the coming of Christ, a Savior, poor and sitting on an ass, even a colt, the foal of an ass. In the eleventh chapter he speaks of the war of the Romans against the Jews; of the breach of the covenant between God and his people; of thirty pieces of silver given for a recompense to the shepherd; of three shepherds put to death in one month, &c.

Zachariah is the longest and the most obscure of the twelve minor prophets. His style is broken and unconnected; but his prophecies concerning the Messiah are more particular and express than those of some other prophets. Several modern critics have been of opinion, that chaps. 9—11 of this prophet were written by Jeremiah; because in Matt. 27: 9, 10, under the name of Jeremiah, we find quoted Zach. 11: 12; and as the chapters make but one continued discourse, they concluded that all three belonged to Jeremiah. Others think it more natural to suppose that the name of Jeremiah, by some mistake, has slipped into the text of Matthew.—Calmet.

ZACHEANS; the disciples of Zacheus, a native of Palestine, who, about the year 350, retired to a mountain near the city of Jerusalem, and there performed his devotions in secret; pretending that prayer was only agreeable to God when it was performed secretly, and in silence.—Hend. Buck.

ZADOK, or SADOQ; son of Ahitub, high-priest of the Jews, of the race of Eleazar. From the decease of Eli the high-priesthood had been in the family of Ithamar; but it was restored to the family of Eleazar, in the time of Saul, in the person of Zadok, who was put in the place of Ahimelech, slain by Saul, A. M. 2944, 1 Sam. 22: 17, 18. While Zadok performed the functions of the priesthood with Saul, Ahimelech performed them with David; so that till the reign of Solomon there were two high-priests in Israel: Zadok, of the race of Eleazar, and Ahimelech of the race of Ithamar, 2 Sam. 8: 17. 15: 24. 1 Kings 1: 5—10. 2: 35.—Calmet.

ZANZUMMIM; ancient giants who dwelt beyond Jordan, in the country afterwards inhabited by the Ammonites, Deut. 2: 20. (See ANAKIM.)—Calmet.

ZANCHIUS, (JEROME,) was born in 1516, at Alanzo, and became a member of the congregation of canons regular of St. Giovanni di Laterano when only fifteen years of age; and while in that society he formed a close intimacy with the celebrated Peter Martyr, who was also an associate of their community. The conversation and example of this distinguished convert to the reformed church made a powerful impression upon Zanchius, as well as upon many of his brethren, which was further increased by the lectures which Peter subsequently delivered at Lucca. The result, though not immediate, was decisive; and Zanchius, after having worn the monastic habit nearly twenty years, at length threw it off, in conjunction with eighteen of his companions, and openly seceded from the Romish communion. This abjuration necessarily induced him to quit Italy; and accordingly, in 1550, he took refuge at Geneva, where he remained two years, and then, declining an invitation to England, he proceeded to Strasbourg. Here he obtained the theological professorship, and read lectures both in divinity and in the Aristotelian philosophy, with great reputation, till 1563, when he removed to Chiavenna, in the Grisons, in the capacity of pastor to a reformed congregation there. The divinity chair at Heidelberg becoming vacant in 1568, he was induced to accept of it, and settled there under the immediate patronage of Frederic III., elector palatine, at whose recommendation he composed his great work against Antinomianism. The death of this prince, in 1578, occasioned his resignation of the professorship: but although he took up his abode after this event, for a short period, at Neustadt, he returned to Heidelberg in 1585, and there passed the remainder of his days. Zanchius was the author of a great variety of controversial treatises, of which one, "On the Doctrine of Predestination," was translated into our language, by the late Rev. Augustus Toplady. The whole of his polemical and devotional writings, his Commentary on the Apostolic Epistles, &c., were collected and printed, in nine volumes, folio, at Geneva, in 1619. The author died at Heidelberg, in 1590.—Hend. Buck.

ZARED; a brook beyond Jordan, on the frontier of Moab, which falls into the Dead sea, Num. 21: 12. Deut. 2: 13, 14.—Calmet.

ZAREPHATH; a city of the Sidonians, between Tyre and Sidon, in Phenicia, on the coast of the Mediterranean sea, and afterwards called Sarepta. It is between Tyre and Sidon, and was the residence of the prophet Elijah, with a poor woman, during a famine in the land of Israel, 1 Kings 17: 9, 10.—Calmet.

ZARETAN; a town in the land of Manasseh on this side Jordan; called Zartanah, in 1 Kings 4: 12. It is said to be near Beth Shen, which was in the northern limits of Manasseh. From Adam to Zaretan the waters dried up, (Josh. 3: 16.) from Zaretan upwards they stood on a heap. The brazen vessels for the temple were cast in the clay ground between Zaretan and Succoth, 1 Kings 7: 46.—Calmet.

ZEAL; a passionate ardor for any person or cause. There are various kinds of zeal; as, 1. An ignorant zeal, Rom. 10: 2, 3. 2. A persecuting zeal, Phil. 3: 6. 3. A superstitious zeal, 1 Kings 18. Gal. 1: 14. 4. A hypocritical zeal, 2 Kings 10: 16. 5. A contentious zeal, 1 Cor. 11: 16. 6. A partial zeal, Hos. 7: 8. 7. A temporary zeal, 2 Kings 12. and 13. Gal. 4: 15. 8. A genuine zeal, which is a sincere and warm concern for the glory of God, and the spiritual welfare of mankind, Gal. 4: 18. Rev. 3: 19.

This is generally compounded of sound knowledge, strong faith, and disinterested regard; and will manifest itself by self-denial, patient endurance, and constant exertion. The motives to true zeal are, 1. The divine command, Rev. 3: 19. 2. The example of Christ and the end of his death, John 2: 17. Acts 10: 38. Tit. 2: 14. 3. The importance of his service. 4. The advantage and pleasure it brings to the possessor. 5. The instances and honorable commendation of it in the Scriptures: Moses, Phineas, Caleb, David, Paul, &c., Gal. 4: 18. Rev. 3: 15, &c. 6. The incalculable good effects it produces on others, James 5: 20. See Reynolds and Orton on Sacred Zeal; Massillon's Charges; Evans' Christian Temper, ser. 37; Hughes', Channing's, and Chapin's Sermon on Zeal; Mason's Chris. Mor., ser. 28; Natural History of Enthusiasm—also Fanaticism.—Hend. Buck.

ZEALOTS; an ancient sect of the Jews, so called from their pretended zeal for God's law, and the honor of religion. They were the followers of Judas of Galilee, and committed all manner of excesses, affirming it would dishonor God to submit to any earthly potentate, especially a heathen.—Hend. Buck.

ZEBOIM; one of the four cities of the Pentapolis consumed by fire from heaven, Gen. 14: 2. 19: 24. Eusebius and Jerome speak of Zebaim as of a city remaining in their time, upon the western shores of the Dead sea. Consequently, after the time of Lot this city must have been rebuilt near where it had stood before. Mention is made of the valley of Zebaim, (1 Sam. 13. 15.) and of a city of the same name in the tribe of Benjamin, Neh. 11: 34.—Watson.

ZEBULUN, the sixth son of Jacob and Leah, (Gen. 30: 20.) was born in Mesopotamia, about A. M. 2256. His sons were Sered, Elon, and Jahleel, Gen. 46: 14. Moses gives us no particulars of his life; but Jacob in his last blessing (Gen. 49: 13) said, "Zebulun shall dwell at the haven of the sea, and he shall be for a haven of ships, and his border shall be unto Zidon." His portion extended to the coast of the Mediterranean, one end of it bordering on this sea, and the other on the sea of Tiberias, Josh. 19: 10. (See CANAAN.) Moses joins Zebulun and Issachar together: (Deut. 33: 18.) "Rejoice, Zebulun, in thy going out; and Issachar, in thy tents. They shall call the people unto the mountain; there they shall offer sacrifices of righteousness: for they shall suck of the abundance of the seas, and of treasures hid in the sand." Meaning, that these two tribes being at the greatest distance north, should come together to the temple at Jerusalem, to the holy mountain, and should bring with them such of the other tribes as dwell in their way; and that occupying part of the coast of the Mediterranean, they should apply themselves to trade and fishing, or to the melting of metals and glass, denoted by those words, treasures hid in the sand. The river Belus, whose sand was very fit for making glass, was in this tribe. (See GLASS.)

When the tribe of Zebulun left Egypt, its chief was Eliab, son of Elon, and it comprehended fifty-seven thousand four hundred men able to bear arms, Num. 1: 9, 30. In another review, thirty-nine years afterwards, it amounted to sixty thousand five hundred men, of age to bear arms, Num. 26: 26, 27. The tribes of Zebulun and Naphtali distinguished themselves in the war of Barak and Deborah against Sisera, the general of the armies of Jabin, Judg. 4: 5, 6, 10. 5: 4, 18. It is thought they were the first carried into captivity beyond the Euphrates, by Pul and Tiglath-Pileser, kings of Assyria, 1 Chron. 5: 26. But they had the advantage of hearing and seeing Christ in their country oftener and longer than any other of the tribes, Isa. 9: 1. Matt. 4: 13, 15.—Calmet.

ZEBULUN; a city of Asher, (Josh. 19: 27.) but probably afterwards yielded to Zebulun, whence it took its name. It was not far from Ptolemais, since Josephus makes the length of lower Galilee to be from Tiberias to Ptolemais. It received the name of Zebulun of men, probably from its great populousness. Elon, judge of Israel, was buried in this city, Judg. 12: 12.—Calmet.

ZEDAD; a city of Syria, in the most northern part of the Land of Promise, Num. 34: 8. Ezek. 47: 15.—Calmet.

ZEDEKIAH, or MATTANIAH, the last king of Judah before the captivity of Babylon, was son of Josiah, and uncle to Jehoniah, his predecessor, 2 Kings 24: 17, 19. When Nebuchadnezzar took Jerusalem, he carried Jehoniah to Babylon, with his wives, children, officers, and the best artificers in Judea, and put in his place his uncle Mattaniah, whose name he changed to Zedekiah, and made him promise, with an oath, that he would maintain fidelity to him, 2 Chron. 36: 13. Ezek. 17: 12, 14, 18. He was twenty-one years old when he began to reign at Jerusalem, and he reigned there eleven years. He did evil in the sight of the Lord, committing the same crimes as Jehoiakim, 2 Kings 24: 18—20. 2 Chron. 36: 11—13. The princes of the people, and the inhabitants of Jerusalem, imitated his impiety, and abandoned themselves to all the abominations of the Gentiles.

In the first year of his reign, Zedekiah sent to Babylon Elasah, son of Shaphan, and Gemariah, son of Hilkiah, probably to carry his tribute to Nebuchadnezzar, and by these messengers Jeremiah sent a letter to the captives of Babylon, Jer. 29: 1, 2—23. Four years afterwards, either Zedekiah went thither himself, or sent thither, (Jer. 32: 12. 51: 59. Baruch 1: 1.) his chief design being to entreat Nebuchadnezzar to return the sacred vessels of the temple, Baruch 1: 8. In the ninth year of his reign, he revolted against Nebuchadnezzar, (2 Kings 25.) in consequence of which the Assyrian marched his army into Judea, and took all the fortified places, except Lachish, Azekah, and Jerusalem. During the siege of the holy city, Zedekiah often consulted Jeremiah, who advised him to surrender, and denounced the greatest woes against him if he should persist in his rebellion, Jer. 37: 3—10. 21. But the unfortunate prince had neither patience to hear, nor resolution to follow, good counsel. In the eleventh year of his reign, on the ninth day of the fourth month, (July,) Jerusalem was taken, 2 Kings 25. Jer. 39: 52. The king and his people endeavored to escape by favor of the night; but the Chaldean troops pursuing them, they were overtaken in the plain of Jericho.

Zedekiah was taken and carried to Nebuchadnezzar, then at Riblah, in Syria, who reproached him with his perfidy, caused all his children to be slain before his face, and his own eyes to be put out; and then loading him with chains of brass, he ordered him to be sent to Babylon, 2 Kings 25. Jer. 32: 52. Thus were accomplished two prophecies, which seemed contradictory; one of Jeremiah, who said that Zedekiah should see, and yet not see, Nebuchadnezzar with his eyes; (chap. 32: 4, 5. 34: 3.) the other of Ezekiel, (12: 13.) which intimated that he should not see Babylon, though he should die there. The year of his death is not known. Jeremiah had assured him (chap. 34: 4, 5.) that he should die in peace; that his body should be burned, as those of the kings of Judah usually were; and that they should mourn for him, saying, Alas, my lord! He reigned eleven years at Jerusalem; and after him the kingdom of Judah was entirely suppressed.—Calmet.

ZEDEKIAH, son of Maaseiah; a false prophet, who always opposed Jeremiah. Against him, and Ahab, son of Kolaiah, the prophet pronounced a terrible curse: (ch. 29: 21, 22.) "Of them shall be taken up a curse by all the captivity of Judah which are in Babylon, saying, The Lord make thee like Zedekiah, and like Ahab, whom the king of Babylon roasted in the fire," &c.—Calmet.

ZEEB, a prince of Midian, was found at a wine-press, and slain by the Ephraimites, who sent his head to Gideon beyond Jordan, whither they pursued their enemies, Judg. 7: 25.—Calmet.

ZEISBERGER, (DAVID), a Moravian missionary among the Indians of North America, was born in Moravia, in Germany, in 1721, whence his parents emigrated to Herrnhut, in Upper Lusatia, for the sake of religious liberty. In 1738 he came to Georgia, where some of his brethren had begun a settlement, that they might preach the gospel to the Creeks. Thence he removed to Pennsylvania, and assisted in the commencement of the settlements of Bethlehem and Nazareth. From 1746 he was, for sixty-two years, a missionary among the Indians. Perhaps no man ever preached the gospel so long among them, and amidst so many trials and hardships. He died at Goshen, on the river Muskingum, in Ohio, November 17, 1805, aged eighty-seven.

He was a man of small stature, with a cheerful countenance, of a cool, intrepid spirit, with a good understanding and sound judgment. His portrait is prefixed to Heckewelder's Narrative. Amidst all his privations and dangers he was never known to complain, nor ever regretted that he had engaged in the cause of the Redeemer. He would never consent to receive a salary, although he deemed it proper for some missionaries. He trusted in his Lord for the necessaries of life, and he looked to the future world for his reward. Free from selfishness, a spirit of universal love filled his bosom. A more perfect character has seldom been exhibited on the earth.

It is a melancholy fact, that he suffered more from white men, called Christians, by reason of their selfishness, and depravity, and hostility to the gospel, than from the Indians. Had the back settlers of our country participated in the benevolent spirit of the Moravians, the benefit to the natives would have been incalculable. Amidst all obstacles, the brethren, in the days of Mr. Zeisberger, instructed and baptized about fifteen hundred Indians. The calm death of those who were murdered at Muskingum, in 1782, is a delightful proof of the influence of the gospel on men, concerning whom it is sometimes said, they cannot be made Christians.

* About 1768 he wrote two grammars of the Onondaga, in English and German, and a dictionary, German and Indian, of more than seventeen hundred pages. In the Leaaape, or language of the Delawares, he published a spelling book, Sermons to Children, and a hymn book, containing upwards of five hundred hymns, translated partly from German and partly from English. He left in manuscript a grammar in German of the Delaware language, which has been translated by Mr. Du Ronceau; also a harmony of the four gospels, translated into Delaware. Amer. Ency.; Heckewelder's Narrative.—Allen.

ZENAS; a Jewish doctor of the law, and afterward disciple of Paul, Tit. 3: 13.—Calmet.

ZEND, or ZENDAVESTA, a book ascribed to Zoroaster, and containing his pretended revelations, which the ancient Magi and modern Parsees observe and reverence in the same manner as the Christians do the Bible, making it the sole rule of their faith and manners. The Zend contains a reformed system of magianism, teaching that there is a Supreme Being, eternal, self-existent, and independent, who created both light and darkness, out of which he made all other things; that these are in a state of conflict, which will continue to the end of the world; that then there shall be a general resurrection and judgment, and that just retribution shall be rendered unto men according to their works; that the angel of darkness, with his followers, shall be consigned to a place of everlasting darkness and punishment; and the angel of light, with his disciples, introduced into a state of everlasting light and happiness; after which, light and darkness shall no more interfere with each other. It is evident, from these, and various other sentiments contained in the Zend, that many parts of it are taken out of the Old Testament. Dr. Baumgarten asserts that this work contains doctrines, opinions, and facts, actually borrowed from the Jews, Christians, and Mohammedans; whence, and from other circumstances, he concludes, that both the history and writings of this prophet were probably invented in the later ages. (See MAGI.)—Hand. Buck.

ZENO, the founder of the sect of the Stoics, was born about B. C. 362, at Citium, in the isle of Cyprus, and quitted mercantile pursuits to become a philosopher. After having received the lessons of Crates, Stilpo, Xenocrates, and Polemon, he himself opened a school of philosophy in the Stoa, or painted portico, whence his followers were called Stoics. He taught for nearly fifty years; was highly respected by the Athenians; and died B. C. 264. (See Stoics.)—Davenport.

ZEPHANIAH was the son of Cushi, and was probably of a noble family of the tribe of Simeon. He prophesied in the reign of Josiah, about B. C. 630. He denounces the judgments of God against the idolatry and sins of his countrymen, and exhorts them to repentance; he predicts the punishment of the Philistines, Moabites, Ammonites, and Ethiopians, and foretells the destruction of Nineveh; he again inveighs against the corruptions of Jerusalem, and with his threats mixes promises of future favor and prosperity to his people; whose recall from their dispersion shall glorify the name of God throughout the world. The style of Zephaniah is poetical; but it is not distinguished by any peculiar elegance or beauty, though generally animated and impressive.—Watson.

ZEPHATH; a city of Simeon, (Judg. 1: 17.) probably the same as Zephathah, near Mareshah, in the south of Judah, 2 Chron. 11: 10. It was called Hormah, or Anathema, after the victory obtained by Israel over the king of Arad, Num. 21: 3. Judg. 1: 17.—Calmet.

ZEPHATHAH, the VALLEY of, near Mareshah, is mentioned 2 Chron. 14: 10. It was, perhaps, near Zephath, or Hormah; or, perhaps, it should be read Shephalah, instead of Zephathah.—Calmet.

ZERED; a brook or torrent which takes its rise in the mountains of Moab, and running from east to west, falls into the Dead sea. It seems to be the stream which Burckhardt calls Wady Beni Hamad, south of the Arnon, and about five hours north of Kerek, the ancient Charak Moab.—Calmet.

ZERERATH; a city in Manasseh, not far from Bethshan, Judg. 7: 22. Also called Zereda, (1 Kings 11: 26.) and Zeredetha; (2 Chron. 4: 17.) perhaps also Zaretan, the narrow dwellings, (Josh. 3: 16. 1 Kings 7: 46.) and Zaretan, 1 Kings 4: 12.—Calmet.

ZERUBBABEL, or ZEROBABEL, was son of Salathiel, of the royal race of David. St. Matthew. 1: 12, and 1 Chron. 3: 17, 19, make Jeconiah king of Judah to be father to Salathiel; but they do not agree as to the father of Zerubbabel. The Chronicles say Pedaiah was father of Zerubbabel; but St. Matthew. St. Luke. Ezra. and Haggai, constantly make Salathiel his father. We must therefore take the name of son in the sense of grandson, and say that Salathiel having educated Zerubbabel, he was always afterwards looked upon as his father. Some think that Jerubbabel had also the name of Sheshbazzar, and that he has this name in Ezra 1: 8. Zerubbabel returned to Jerusalem at the beginning of the reign of Cyrus, A. M. 3468, fifteen years before the reign of Darius son of Hystaspes. Cyrus committed to his care the sacred vessels of the temple, with which he returned to Jerusalem, Ezra 1: 11. He is always named first, as being the chief of the Jews that returned to their own country; (Ezra 2: 2. 3: 8. 5: 2.) he laid the foundations of the temple; (Ezra 3: 8. 9. Zech. 4: 9, &c.) and restored the worship of the Lord, and the usual sacrifices.—Watson.

ZIDON. (See SINOX.)

ZIF; the second month of the holy year of the Hebrews; afterwards called Jair; it answers nearly to April, 1 Kings 6: 1. (See MONN.)—Calmet.

ZIKLAG; a city that Achish, king of Gath, gave to David, when he took shelter among the Philistines, (1 Sam. 27: 6.) and which, after that time, always belonged to the kings of Judah. The Amalekites took it, and plundered it, in the absence of David. Joshua had allotted it to the tribe of Simeon, Josh. 19: 5. Eusebius says it lay in the south of Canaan.—Calmet.

ZIMMERMAN, (JOHN GEORGE,) a physician and miscellaneous writer, was born in 1728, at Brugg, in the canton of Berne; studied medicine under Haller at Göttingen; practised for some years in his native place; was appointed, in 1768, chief physician to the king of England at Hanover; attended Frederic of Prussia on his death-bed; was a violent literary opponent of the Illuminati and the French revolutionists; and died, in 1795, a victim to hyochondriac disease. Among his works are, a Treatise on Solitude; (once highly popular;) an Essay on National Pride; and a Treatise on the Experience of Medicine.—Davenport.

ZIMRI, a general of half the cavalry of Elah, king of Israel, when he rebelled against his master, (1 Kings 16: 9, 10.) killed him, and usurped his kingdom. Although he reigned but seven days, he cut off the whole family of Elah, not sparing any of his relations or friends; whereby was fulfilled the word of the Lord, denounced to Baasha, the father of Elah, by the prophet Jehu.—Calmet.

ZIN; a city south of the Land of Promise, (Num. 34: 4.) perhaps the Sennaah of Ezra 2: 35. Eusebius mentions Migdal-Senna, or the tower of Senna, eight miles from Jericho, north; but this cannot be the Zin, or Sennaah, of Numbers.—Calmet.

ZINZENDORF, (NICHOLOUS LOUIS, Count,) the patron of the sect of the Moravians, was born at Dresden, in May, 1700. He studied at Halle and Utrecht. About the year 1721, he purchased the lordship of Bertholdsdorf, in Lusatia. Some poor Christians, the followers of John Huss, obtained leave in 1722 to settle on his estate. They soon made converts. Such was the origin of the village of Herrnhut. Their noble patron soon after joined them.

From this period Count Zinzendorf devoted himself to the business of instructing his fellow-men by his writings and by preaching. He travelled through Germany, and in Denmark became acquainted with the Danish missions in the East Indies and Greenland. About 1732 he engaged earnestly in the promotion of missions by his Moravian brethren, whose numbers at Herrnhut were then about five hundred. So successful were these missions, that in a few years four thousand negroes were baptized in the West Indies, and the converts in Greenland amounted to seven hundred and eighty-four.

In 1737 he visited London, and in 1741 came to America, and preached at Germantown and Bethlehem. February 11, 1742, he ordained at Oly, in Pennsylvania, the missionaries Kauch and Buetner, and Rauch baptized three Indians from Shekomeco, east of the Hudson, "the firstlings of the Indians." He soon, with his daughter, Benigna, and several brethren and sisters, visited various tribes of Indians. At Shekomeco he established the first Indian Moravian congregation in North America. In 1743 he returned to Europe. He died at Herrnhut in 1760, and his coffin was carried to the grave by thirty-two preachers and missionaries, whom he had reared, and some of whom had toiled in Holland, England, Ireland, North America, and Greenland. What monarch was ever honored by a funeral like this?—Davenport; Allen.

ZION. (See SION.)

ZIPH; the second Hebrew month, 1 Kings 6: 1. 2. Son of Jehalaleel, of Judah, and of the family of Caleb; (1 Chron. 4: 16.) he probably gave his name to the city of Ziph, in Judah. 3. A city of Judah, (Josh. 15: 24.) near Hebron, eastward, and in the wilderness of which David kept himself concealed for some time, 1 Sam. 23. 14, 15. 4. Another city near Maon and Carmel of Judah, Josh. 15: 55.—Calmet.

ZIPPORAH, or SEPHORA; wife of Moses, daughter of Jethro, and mother of Eliezer and Gershom, Exod. 2: 16, &c. (See MOSES.)—Calmet.

ZISCA, (JOHN,) a celebrated Bohemian warrior, was born about 1380, of a noble family. His real name was Trocznowo, but he received the appellation of Zisca, or one-eyed, after having lost an eye in battle. When the Hussites rose in arms, to oppose the succession of Sigismund to the crown of Bohemia, they placed Zisca at their head, and he justified their choice by numerous victories over the enemy. Though he lost his other eye during the contest, he compelled Sigismund to submit to humiliating terms of peace. He died in 1424.—Davenport.

ZOAN; a royal city of Egypt, and extremely ancient; called in Greek Tanis, (Judith 1: 10.) and built, no doubt, by emigrants, Num. 13: 22. Ps. 78: 12, 43. Isa. 19: 11, 13. 30: 4. Ezek. 30: 14.—Calmet.

ZOAR, a city of the Pentapolis, on the southern extremity of the Dead sea, was destined, with the other five cities, to be consumed by fire from heaven; but at the intercession of Lot it was preserved, Gen. 14: 2. It was originally called Bela; but after Lot entreated the angel's permission to take refuge in it, and insisted on the smallness of this city, it had the name Zoar, which signifies small or little.—Calmet.

ZOHARITES, so called from their attachment to the book Zohar, are properly to be regarded as a continuation of the sect formed by the famous Zabatai Zevi. Their creed is briefly as follows: 1. They believe in all that God has ever revealed, and consider it their duty constantly to investigate its meaning. 2. They regard the letter of Scripture to be merely the shell, and that it admits of a mystical and spiritual interpretation. 3. They believe in a Trinity of Parzufim, or persons, in Elohim. 4. They believe in the incarnation of God; that this incarnation took place in Adam, and that it will again take place in the Messiah. 5. They do not believe that Jerusalem will ever be rebuilt. 6. They believe that it is vain to expect any temporal Messiah; but that God will be manifested in the flesh, and in this state atone, not only for the sins of the Jews, but for the sins of all throughout the world, who believe in him.

This sect was revived about the year 1750, by a Polish Jew, of the name of Jacob Frank, who settled in Podolia, and enjoyed the protection of the Polish government, to which he was recommended by the bishop of Kamenez, in whose presence he held disputes with the orthodox Jews, and who was astonished at the approximation of his creed to the principles of Christianity. On the death of the bishop, he and his adherents were driven into the Turkish dominions; and being also persecuted there by the rabbimists, they resolved to conform to the rites of the Catholic church. Frank at last found a place of rest at Offenbach, whither his followers flocked by thousands to visit him, and where he died in 1791. Their numbers do not appear to have increased much of late; but they are to be met with in different parts of Hungary and Poland.—Hend. Buck.

ZOHELETH; a stone near the fountain of Rogel, or En-rogel, just under the walls of Jerusalem, 1 Kings 1: 9. The rabbins tell us, that it served as an exercise to the young men, who tried their strength by throwing it, or rather rolling it, or lifting it. Others think it was useful to the fullers, or whistlers, to beat their clothes upon, after they had washed them.—Calmet.

ZOLLIKOFFER, (GEORGE JOACHIM), a SWISS divine, was born in 1730, at Saint Gall; was educated at Bremen and Utrecht; was, successively, a minister in the Pays de Vaud, the Grisons, and at Leipsic; and died in 1798. Of his Sermons, which form fifteen volumes, a part have been translated into English.—Davenport.

ZOPHAR, the Naamathite; a friend of Job, chap. 2: 11. The LXX. call him Sophar, king of the Minrans; the interpreter of Origen makes him king of the Nomades.—Calmet.

ZORAH; a city of Dan, and the birthplace of Samson, (Judg. 16: 31.) on the frontier of Dan, and of Judah, not far from Eshtaol. Eusebius places it ten miles from Eleutheropolis, towards Nicopolis, not far from Kapharsorek. Calmet thinks the Zorites, (1 Chron. 2: 54.) and the Zorathites, (1 Chron. 4: 2.) were inhabitants of Zorah.—Calmet.

ZOROASTER; an ancient philosopher, of whose history little or nothing that is authentic is known. There are supposed to have been several of the name. The most celebrated, however, the Zerdusht of the Persians, is believed to have been the reformer of the Magian system of religion, and the author of the Zendavesta, which contains the doctrines that he taught. Irreconcilable differences exist among the learned as to the time in which he flourished. (See ZEND, and MAGI).—Davenport.

ZUINGLIANS; a branch of the reformers, so called from Zuinglius, the celebrated Swiss divine, whose life we have given in the following article. His chief difference from Luther was concerning the eucharist. He maintained that the bread and wine were only significations of the body and blood of Jesus Christ, whereas Luther believed in consubstantiation, which see.—Hend. Buck.

ZUINGLIUS, (ULRICUS), or ULRIC ZUINGLE, was born on the 1st of January, 1484, at Wildhaus, a village of the county of Tokenburg, in Switzerland. His father was a simple peasant, but was much and generally esteemed. The early manifestations which young Ulric gave of superior genius determined his father to consecrate him to the church. With this intention, he sent him first to Basil and then to Bern, where a school of polite literature had been lately founded. The instructions he there received were principally in Latin. The Dominicans at that time exerted great influence in the city of Bern. Eager to preserve the authority they enjoyed, they sought to entrap into their errors and superstitions, amongst others, young Zuinglius; and profiting by the indiscretion of a youth left to his own guidance, they prevailed upon him to come and reside in their convent till he should have attained the age requisite for entering upon the novitiate. Zuinglius' father greatly disapproved of this step, and ordered him to quit Bern, and repair to Vienna, the university of which city enjoyed great celebrity. Zuinglius obeyed; arrived at his new place of destination, and applied to the study of philosophy. After two years passed at Vienna, Zuinglius returned to his father's house, but did not long remain there. The knowledge that he had already acquired was not sufficient for him; he was desirous both of adding to his store, and of applying what he already possessed. He therefore repaired a second time to Basil. The situation of a teacher having become vacant, it was intrusted to Zuinglius, who was scarcely then eighteen years of age; and he labored with success to facilitate and encourage the study of the ancient languages. The duties of his situation by no means absorbed the whole active mind of Zuinglius, and therefore he continued to learn as well as to teach. In the mean time he did not neglect the studies peculiar to the profession for which he was designed by his father.

At Basil Zuinglius took the degree of master of arts. In the midst of the most assiduous application, and the most serious kinds of employment, Zuinglius was a cheerful and agreeable companion. He had resided four years at Basel, when the burghers of Glaris, the chief town of the canton of that name, chose him for their pastor. He accepted this situation, which brought him nearer to his family; and repaired thither after receiving holy orders. In order that he might perform with advantage the duties of the Christian ministry intrusted to him, Zuinglius thought he stood in need of deeper and more extensive learning than he already possessed. He accordingly resolved to recommence his theological studies. An assiduous perusal of the New Testament preceded his new researches. In order to render himself more familiar with Paul's epistles, he copied the Greek text with his own hand, adding, in the margin, a multitude of notes, extracted from the fathers of the church, as well as his own observations. The attention of Zuinglius was now directed to the passages of Scripture cited in the canon of the mass, and to those which serve as a basis to the most essential precepts of the Catholic church.

After endeavoring to explain the text of the gospel by itself, Zuinglius also made himself acquainted with the interpretations given by other theologians, especially by the fathers of the church. From the fathers Zuinglius went on to the obscure authors of the middle ages; their rude style and absurd opinions would soon have discouraged him, had he not wished to become minutely informed of the state of Christianity during these ages of ignorance. It was not from mere curiosity that Zuinglius undertook these long and painful studies, but for the sake of fixing his faith on a solid and immovable foundation. The result of this examination was very different from what he expected. It now appeared to him that many Catholic interpretations of the Holy Scriptures were incorrect, and that the primitive mode of worship had also undergone considerable changes. The nearer he traced Christianity to its sources, the less he found it encumbered with the multitude of observances in which his contemporaries made the essence of religion to consist. In the eyes of Zuinglius, also, the almost unbounded power of the priests appeared contrary to gospel principles. He was sufficiently aware that the clerical body now required a different organization from that of the first ages; but he thought that the servants of the altar, far from seeking to withdraw themselves from the jurisdiction of the temporal magistrate, ought to have afforded the example of constant submission to the established power. However just these reflections appeared to Zuinglius, he was in no haste to make them known, and he only allowed himself to submit them to the examination of some learned men, with whom he maintained an active correspondence. Zuinglius followed this course during his ten years' abode at Glaris. During his residence at Glaris, Zuinglius was twice ordered, by his government, to accompany the troops of the canton, in the capacity of chaplain. The reputation of Zuinglius having gained high celebrity, he was sent for to Zurich, and created preacher in the cathedral, to which office he was installed December, 1518, deeply regretted by the parishioners whom he quitted. In 1522 he published a tract "On the Observation of Lent." This work, the first that Zuinglius published, much irritated the popish party against him. Zuinglius caused an assembly to be called, for the purpose of composing the difference in religion, by the senate of Zurich, on the 29th of January, 1523. He had drawn his doctrines into thirty-seven propositions, which, he was fully persuaded, were agreeable to the gospel. When the consultation was over, the assembly passed an edict greatly in favor of Zuinglius; and, in fact, the whole proceeding reflected great honor on his principles. After the publication of this edict, the doctrine of Zuinglius became general throughout the whole canton of Zurich, under the name of evangelical truth.

Zuinglius was, however, determined to perfect his design of introducing the reformed doctrine into Switzerland, and therefore engaged the senate to call a new assembly. They assembled, accordingly, on the 26th of October, 1523; the disputations were concerning the worship of images. The resolution of this conference was, that no images were to be allowed among Christians. In the next conference, they discoursed about the mass, which Zuinglius maintained was no sacrifice. They accordingly passed the like sentence upon the mass. About this time Zuinglius wrote several books in defence of his doctrine. A council was assembled at Baden. The decisions were not adopted, however, throughout all Switzerland; the cantons of Bern, Glaris, Basil, Schaffhausen, and Appenzel, refused to admit them. Thus the efforts of the assembly of Baden, far from weakening the party of the reformer, rather gave it fresh strength. In the year 1527 several municipalities of the canton of Bern addressed the senate for the abolition of the mass, and the introduction of the worship established at Zurich. In the mean time preparations were making at Bern to give the assembly the greatest possible solemnity. Haller was earnestly desirous of the presence of Zuinglius. Zuinglius was by no means disposed to lose an opportunity of unfolding his doctrine before a numerous auditory, which appeared to be disposed in his favor. He therefore repaired to Bern, accompanied by several Swiss and German theologians, who all assembled at Zurich towards the end of the year 1527. As soon as Zuinglius arrived at Bern, the convocation began its sittings, at which the great council assisted in a body. The ten theses, composed by Haller, containing the essential points of Zuinglius' doctrine, were successively discussed. Zuinglius and those of his party defended them with so much success, that they gained over a great number of the clergy to their doctrines. The conference at Bern was very serviceable to the cause of reform, from the splendor reflected on it by the union of so many celebrated men. The town adopted the reformed worship, and, in the space of four months, all the municipalities of the canton followed the example. In 1525, Zuinglius published his book, "De vera et falsa Religione."

In the year 1531 a civil war broke out in Switzerland, between the five cantons who still adhered to the errors of the Roman Catholic religion, and the cantons of Zurich and Bern, who strongly supported the cause of the Reformation, when the latter were defeated in their own territories, with the loss of four hundred men. Zuinglius, who accompanied the army of the reformers, in the capacity of chaplain, (as it was the custom of the Swiss to send their head pastor to war, as chaplain,) was killed, in the forty-seventh year of his age; and, while dying, was heard to repeat these words: "Can this be considered as a calamity? Well, they are able, indeed, to slay the body; but they are not able to kill the soul." His body being found by the Roman Catholics, they burnt it to ashes.

Zuinglius was a man of uncommon learning; his mind was stored with useful knowledge; and his zeal for the cause of religion was tempered with prudence and moderation. His pure and discriminating mind early led him to seek the paths of that evangelical truth which he maintained till death with consistent firmness. To Switzerland is due the honor of having produced many such men as the noble and worthy reformer Zuinglius, to whom posterity will ever be indebted.—Hend. Buck.

ZUPH; a Levite, great-grandfather of Elkanah, the father of Samuel, and head of the family of the Zuphim, who dwelt at Ramath; whence it had its name of Ramathaim Zophim, (1 Sam. 1: 1. 1 Chron. 6: 35.) and the land of Zuph, 1 Sam. 9: 5.—Calmet.

ZUR; a city of Judah; (Josh. 15: 58. Neh. 3: 16. 1 Chron. 2: 45. 2 Chron. 11: 7.) called Bethsura, and described as a strong town in 2 Mac. 11: 5.—Calmet.

ZUZIM; certain giants who dwelt beyond Jordan, and were conquered by Chedorlaomer and his allies, Gen. 14: 5. The Chaldee and the LXX. have taken Zuzim in the sense of an appellative, for stout and valiant men. Calmet conjectures the Zuzim to be the Zamzammim of Deut. 2: 20. (See ANAKIM).—Calmet.

MISSIONARY GAZETTEER.

ABYSSINIA; an empire of Africa, 770 miles long, and 550 broad; bounded N. by Senaar, E. by the Red sea, W. and S. partly by Senaar and Kordofan, and partly by barbarous regions, of which the names have scarcely reached us. It is divided into three separate states, Tigre, Amhara, and Efat. The capital of Tigre is the ancient Axum. The king, or negus, as he was formerly called, lives at Gondar, in Amhara, enjoying only a nominal sovereignty. The country is mountainous, but in the vales the soil is fertile. The rainy season continues from April to September. This is succeeded, without interval, by a cloudless sky, and a vertical sun; but cold nights constantly follow these scorching days. The earth, notwithstanding these days, is cold to the soles of the feet; partly owing to the six months' rain, when no sun appears, and partly to the perpetual equality of nights and days. No country in the world produces a greater variety of quadrupeds, both wild and tame. Birds are also numerous, and some are of an immense size and of great beauty. There is a remarkable coincidence between the customs in the court of ancient Persia and those of Abyssinia. The religion of the country is a mixture of Judaism and the Christianity of the Greek church; and the language bears a great affinity to the Arabic. The government is legally a despotism, but in an unsettled state; for the power of the emperor is very weak, and the ras, or prince of the empire, and the chiefs of the provinces, are generally in enmity with one another. The people are of a dark olive complexion; their dress is a light robe, bound with a sash, and the head is covered with a turban.

The C. M. S. are taking measures to establish a mission in Abyssinia. Messrs. Gotat and Isenberg, missionaries.

AFRICA, is a vast peninsula, forming a triangle, with its vertex towards the south, containing 12,000,000 square miles. Its length is 4600 miles, and its greatest breadth 3500. It is situated between 13° W. and 51° E. lon., and from 34° N. to 36° S. lat. It has the Atlantic ocean on the N.; Asia, the Red sea, and the Indian ocean on the E.; the Southern and Atlantic ocean on the S. and W. It is on the whole more level than any other portion of the globe, though it has immense chains of mountains. There are vast deserts of sand, interspersed with small verdant islands, called oases. The principal rivers are the Nile, Niger, Senegal, Gambia, Congo, Orange, &c. To the naturalist Africa is a wonderful country. It can enumerate five times as many species of quadrupeds as Asia, and three times as many as all America.

The population of Africa is probably between 100 and 110 millions. The interior of the country must be very populous, since it has produced immense multitudes for the slave traffic. The inhabitants belong to two branches of the human family;—to the black, or Ethiopian race, which extends from the Niger to the Southern extremity, comprising, perhaps, the Hottentots; and to the Caucasian race, which includes the natives of Egypt, Coele, the Arabs or Moors, the Abyssinians, and the nations of Nubia. The Arabic is the leading language of the north; the Mandingo is used from the Senegal to the Niger. The languages of the negroes are as multifarious as the nations. In Sahara alone 43 dialects are said to be spoken. Equally manifold are the modes of religious worship. The most loathsome Fetishism prevails among most of the negro nations, demanding, in many cases, from its votaries the sacrifice of human life. Mahomedanism has diffused itself over most of the northern and eastern regions. The Christian religion, though in very various and debased forms, is professed in Abyssinia, Nubia, and among the Copts. The tropic of Cancer and the equator divide Africa into three principal parts:—1. The Northern, including the Barbary States and the northern part of Sahara; 2. The Central, comprising Nubia, Abyssinia, Aethi, Aeen, the southern part of Sudan or Sahara, Beah, Senegaubia, Guinea, &c.; 3. All Africa south of the last-named countries.

AGRA; a province of Hindostan Proper, 250 miles long, and 150 broad; bounded on the N. by Delhi, E. by Oude and Allahabad, S. by Malwa, and W. by Ajemeer.

The capital of this province is a large city, the air of which is esteemed very healthy. The river Jumna runs through it. The emperor Akbar founded this magnificent city, which is now for the most part, a heap of ruins. The city rises from the river Jumna, and extends in a vast semicircle. The fort, in which is included the imperial palace, which occupied about 1000 laborers for 12 years, and cost nearly 3,000,000 rupees, is of great extent. This city was taken by Madhajeo Sindia, and continued in the possession of the Mahrattas until 1803, when it was captured by the British army under general Lake, after a short and vigorous siege. It has ever since remained in the possession of the British government. By the new charter granted to the East India company in 1833, Agra was made the seat of a fourth presidency, and Sir Charles T. Metcalfe, late one of the governor-general's councils, was appointed governor. 100 m. S. E. Delhi, 800 m. N. W. of Calcutta; E. lon. 77° 56', N. lat. 27° 12'. Population about 40,000.

This place has engaged the attention of the C. M. S. In November, 1812, Abdool Massach, a converted native of Delhi, one of the fruits of the Rev. Henry Martyn's ministry, accompanied the Rev. Daniel Corrie to Agra, with the design of settling there as a public reader and catechist. On his arrival he commenced his work with great zeal, and as many hundred persons had recently flocked to the neighborhood, in consequence of a scarcity in the Mahratta country occasioned by a terrible drought, he went among them distributing picce, or half-pence, and inviting them to hear the gospel, and to send their children to him to learn to read. At first they received him as an angel of light; but a report having been circulated, that he was an Arabian, who wished to carry off their children, the poor natives, for several days, refused to receive the charity he offered them, or to hear any thing from him. In the course of a week or two, however, they perceived that their suspicions were unfounded; and his public services were attended by hundreds, many of whom, on hearing an exposition of the decalogue, cried out aloud, "These are true words; and the curse of God will fall upon us if we obey them not." Indeed, the congregations soon began to increase rapidly, and comprised many respectable persons; both Hindoos and Mohammedans. A school was also opened for the instruction of children; persons visited the catechist every day for religious conversation; and a venerable old man, who stated that he was ninety years of age, acknowledged that his soul had been greatly refreshed by the things he had heard.

He visited from time to time the chief cities in the upper provinces, and everywhere, by the simplicity and uprightness of his conduct, and the interesting manner in which, on every occasion, he introduced the subject of religion, excited much attention. Some of the principal British residents at Agra, in the absence of a chaplain, attended divine service in Hindostan, and received the Lord's supper with the native Christians. In 1825, he was admitted by bishop Heber into the ministry of the established church. The bishop thus remarks about his person and character: "He is a very fine old man, with both Hindoo and Mohammedan. A school was also opened for the instruction of children; persons visited the catechist every day for religious conversation; and a venerable old man, who stated that he was ninety years of age, acknowledged that his soul had been greatly refreshed by the things he had heard."

In 1826 he was stationed at Lucknow, and succeeded in disarming all opposition, by his wisdom and kindness, while he asserted, most uncompromisingly, the peculiar doctrines of revelation. In the early part of 1827, he was taken fatally sick. Here the value of the Christian religion appeared in an eminent degree. His whole deportment was marked by calm and cheerful resignation. He had composed a hymn, which afforded him much consolation. The following is a literal translation of two stanzas.

Beloved Savior, let not me
In thy fond heart forgotten be;
Of all that decks the field or tower,
Thou art the sweetest, fairest flower.

Youth's morn has fled, old age come on,
But sin distract my soul alone;
Beloved Savior, let not me
In thy fond heart forgotten be.

The conversion, life, labors, and success of Abdool Messach, encourage it to hope, that, in process of time, India will supply herself with competent ministers of the gospel; for doubtless many other natives of the country may be found, possessing a similar capacity for improvement and usefulness.

The mission at Agra is now supplied with the labors of T. Cussons, catechist, and Fuez Messach, native catechist. The congregation varies from 16 to 40. Communicants, 12. Scholars, 78. The boys now readily read the Scriptures. Mr. Cussons visits the fairs, and finds the people anxious to obtain religious books.

AMHEERAPAD, the Rev. T. D. Pettuger, of the Gospel Propagation society, had but just commenced his labors, in 1832, at this station, which is near Dombay, when he was cut off by the cholera. The circumstances of this mission are promising.

AHMEDNUGGER; a city formerly of great splendor under the Mohammedan power; 175 miles north-east of Bombay, on the highland of the Deccan, 2300 feet above the level of the sea; inhabitants 50,000, chiefly using the Mahratta language, with many villages of easy access, and English commandments of about 1000 soldiers. Here resided George W. Briggs, of the A. E. C. F. M. missionaries; Dajeeb, native assistant. The religious services are sustained as heretofore. The number of hearers on the Sabbath is from 40 to 60. There is one school for boys and three for girls. There is no chapel at the station. An asylum supported by Europeans is still under charge of the American mission, and affords important facilities for preaching the gospel. Church has 15 members.

ATULAKI; an island of the Harvey group, in the South seas, where the London Missionary society have established a mission, where two native teachers are employed.

AKYAB; an island in the Arrakan river, 450 miles S. S. E. of Serampore. A mission was established here in 1821 by the Serampore Baptists. J. C. Fink, with two native assistants, and one at each of four outstations, has charge of it. At the several stations and in numerous villages, the gospel has been assiduously preached. Some have died in the faith; others have been baptized; an English school has been established; all the female communicants have learned to read and write since their baptism.

ALBANY; a newly-established district in the eastern part of Cape Colony, South Africa, extending from Bojesmans river to the Keiskamma. The extent of the new settlement is about 60 miles by 30.

In 1820, the settlers amounted to 15,000. The condition of grants to the colonists is, that they cultivate this soil without slaves. The soil is productive, and the climate healthy.

The Albany mission was commenced in 1827 by the Wesleyan Society, with the settlers who went out from England, in the hope that it would connect itself with the Hottentots, and ultimately prepare the means for extending the gospel among the Caffre tribes. These hopes have been realized, and that more immediately and extensively than was previously anticipated. Agents have likewise been raised up to accompany these brethren who have been planted themselves among the savages in Caffra.

W. Shaw, W. J. Shrewsbury, and Samuel Lee are missionaries. Several new chapels have been built. The congregations and schools are in a prosperous condition. Members, 362. Scholars, 549. There is a strong and cordial union between the European members and the members who belong to various tribes of natives. All colors love as brethren.

ALEXANDRIA; a town of Egypt, now much decayed, though there are still some remains of ancient splendor. It was first built by Alexander the Great, and was several miles in extent; but at present it consists chiefly of one long street. It was formerly a place of great trade, all the treasures of the East Indies being deposited here before the discovery of the route by the cape of Good Hope. Alexandria was taken by the French invaders under Buonaparte in 1798, and taken from them by the English, in 1801. It surrendered to the English in 1807, but was soon after evacuated. Here is an obelisk called Cleopatra's Needle; and also Pompey's Pillar, and the ancient Pharos, now a castle called Pharillon. Alexandria is seated on the Mediterranean, 125 miles W. N. W. Cairo, E. lon. 30° 40' N. lat. 31° 14'. The library of Alexandria, at one time, amounted to 700,000 volumes. The population, formerly amounting to 200,000, does not now exceed 12,600; the houses, 3132. By the building of a canal from Cairo to Alexandria, the commerce of the latter has been much improved. In 1824, 1250 ships arrived, and 1159 departed.

The British Wesleyan Missionary society commenced a mission in Alexandria in 1825. James Bartholomew is the only missionary. He preaches in the ships and in the town, distributes the Scriptures and tracts, and finds employment among a people gathered from almost every country of the world.

ALGIERS. Mr. F. C. Ewald, of the London Jews' society, arrived at Algiers, on his mission to his Jewish brethren, September 17, 1832. His entrance on his work was most discouraging; but the faith bestowed upon him gives promise of future blessings. Many of the Jews were not only ready to receive the Scriptures, but anxious to them. About 10,000 Moriscos; 2000 Bedouins and Biskeras; 5000 Jews, and 5000 Europeans. Since the arrival of the French, the native population has diminished two-thirds. Emigration began with the rich and extended to the lower classes. There are 57 mosques, 17 synagogues, and 1 French Catholic chapel. In all quarters, there are small Mohammedan schools. Two Frenchmen have established a school, and Madame Lamine a charity school of girls. There are two libraries, a lithographic press, and the Algerine Monitor, a government newspaper.

ALLAHABAD; a province of Hindostan Proper, 260 miles long, and 120 broad; bounded on the N. by Agra and Oude, E. by Bahar, S. by Gaudiana, and W. by Malwa and Agra.

Allahabad, the capital of the above province, has a magnificent citadel. It was founded by the emperor Acher, who intended it as a place of arms; and its fortifications are now improved to a battle army. It stands at the conflux of the Jumna, the Ganges, and the Sereswati, which is the largest and most holy prayaga of the Hindoos; so noted, that it is called "the king of worshipped places," and the territory, to the extent of 40 miles round, is deemed holy ground. So numerous are the pilgrims who resort thither for ablutio, that for this indulgence an annual contribution of 50,000 rupees has been paid into the ruler's treasury. It is 47 miles W. N. W. of Calcutta, S. 81° 50' N. lat. 25° 27'. The inhabitants, exclusive of the garrison, amount to 20,000.

At this place human sacrifices were of frequent occurrence. The following instance, as described by a spectator of the scene, is thus given by Mr. Ward: "Sixteen females, accompanied by as many priests, went in boats on the river opposite Allahabad, and proceeded to the spot where the Ganges and the Jumna, two sacred rivers, unite their purifying streams. Each victim had a large earthen pan slung over her shoulders. She descended over the side of the boat into the river, and was then held up by a priest, till she had filled the pans from the river, when the priest let go his hold, and the pans dragged her to the bottom. And thus died amidst the applauses of the spectators, and assisted by the priests of the country, sixteen females, as a single offering to the deities of the river. The bloodier the sacrifice, the more anxious they were to be directed way to heaven. The priests enjoyed the scene, and spoke of it to their friends as a pleasant morning gambol. We have here no weepers; no mourners; no youth interposing to save them to society. They go down to the bottom as loose stones which have no adhesion to the quarry; as creatures for which society has no use. Nor must it be supposed that this is a solitary instance; and these immolations are now in progress; and in consequence, on making their appearance in the city of Allahabad, the people assembled in great numbers.

Mr. Mackintosh was subsequently fixed at this place, and in 1819, assisted by two native brethren, Seeta Rama and Nripota, his labors appear to have excited considerable notice.

Mr. Mackintosh continued to labor for some time with but little success; but an English friend in gave away the new abutier; and in consequence from his ministry, generously sent him 2000 rupees, to build a place of worship. In 1825, however, the prospect appeared brightening; a church was formed, consisting of nine members, among whom were two or three pious Europeans; and five Hindoo youths read the New Testament with Mr. Mackintosh.

David Batavia, a native catechist, has now at Allahabad a school of 40 boys, and holds worship with 20 or 25 native Christians.

ALLEGHANY; one of the reservations of the Iugians in the western part of New York; William Hall teacher, and his wife, under the care of the A. B. C. F. M. Number of church members, 53. Promising state of religious feeling has existed during the year.

ALLEPIE, a large town on the Malabar coast, about 40 miles from Cochin, and 120 N. of cape Comorin, is the chief place; at which the company's ships call to take in pepper and spices; it has a healthy climate, and about 13,000 inhabitants. Inhabitants 30,000, with a very populous vicinity.

A good house and garden having been granted by the annee of Travancore, at the request of the resident, a church was begun in 1816, sufficiently spacious to accommodate 700 or 800 persons; and the Rev. Mr. Norton was settled there.

In 1819, the English congregation consisted of about 40 persons, and the native of about 100, of all ages, Syrians, converts from the Romish church, and catechumens. Occasionally auditors of all persuasions also attended. The schools suffered material diminution at this period, in consequence of the disturbance between the Syrians and the Roman Catholics; most of the Roman children having been withdrawn. At the end of the year the number of scholars was about 50, but subsequently the scholars generally returned. A school was also established in the suburbs of Allepie, from which much benefit was anticipated, and the general aspect of the mission was encouraging. During the following year Mr. Norton baptized 26 persons, including children, and distributed 122 Bibles and Testaments in different languages, and 18 copies of Genesis in Tamul, with 130 prayer books and psalters in English and Tamul.

T. Norton is now the missionary of Allepie, John Roberts assistant, with native assistants. Mohammedans and Roman Catholics show symptoms of the power of truth on their consciences, and the heathen are ashamed of their idols and superstitions; about 70 children and adults attend family prayer every morning with encouraging evidences of being good men; the boys' seminary there has 28 children, and the school, 20, separated from the beneficial influence of vice and idolatry, and give good promise of becoming a blessing to their country. Mr. Norton is proceeding in the careful revision of the translation of the Old Testament into Malayalam.

AMBOYNA; an island in the Indian ocean, the Dutch metropolis of the Moluccas. It is 56 miles long, and divided, at the S. W. end, by a large inlet into two limbs, the larger being 28 and the smaller 18 miles long. The surface is beautiful; woody hills and verdant plains being interspersed with hamlets, and enriched by cultivation. The chief products are cloves, the trees of which are about 40 or 50 feet high, nutmegs, sugar, coffee, and many delicious fruits; also, a peculiar wood, that is used for beautiful cabinet-work. The English and Dutch had factories here at the beginning of the 17th century; but the Dutch expelled the English in 1605, and the English expelled the Dutch in 1607. The island was taken by the British in 1796, restored in 1802, and again taken in 1810, and restored in 1815. When the English took Amboyna in 1796, it contained about 45,252 inhabitants; of whom no less than 17,813 were Protestants; the rest were Mohammedans and Chinese.

Amboyna, the chief town, is neatly built, and stands near the middle of the bay, on the smaller limb, detached by the fort Victoria. The Dutch are tolerably polished, but the natives are rude and uncultivated. The houses are made of bamboo-canes and sugarcree, generally one story high, on account of frequent earthquakes. E. lon. 128° 15', S. lat. 3° 40'.

The Rev. Joseph Kam, from the L. M. S., fixed upon this island, in 1814, as the scene of his labors. Early in 1816, his congregation in the Dutch church, on the Lord's day, amounted in general to 400 or 500 persons. The first sermon was preached in the Malay language he had usually from 500 to 600 hearers.

Speaking of the inhabitants of Amboyna, he says, "The great body of Christians residing here are not Europeans, or half-castes, but persons whose ancestors have resided here from generation to generation. Among them, I will venture to say, there are thousands who would part with every thing they possess to obtain a copy of the Bible in their own tongue; and if they hear that I am to preach in the Malay language, which is, at present, more my business than preaching in Dutch, many collect together two hours before the service commences."

In 1819, Mr. Finn, from the N. M. S., joined Mr. Kam, and has since successfully assisted him in his labors. Messrs. Ferdinand Borneister, Frederic Mueller, from the Basle seminary, and Mr. Akerstoth, from Holland, also arrived in 1821, and commenced the study of the languages, preparatory to their becoming missionaries in different islands.

The Rev. Joseph Kam, originally a missionary, but now and for some years past a minister of the Dutch church, continues in charge of Amboyna and the neighboring islands. His communicants amount to about 2000. He makes annual voyages to various parts of the Archipelago; where he baptizes and administers the Lord's supper to the members of the Dutch church. He is very laborious in the discharge of his ministry.

AMERICA. E. of Asia, W. of Europe and Africa, between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, lies the continent of America. It extends from lat. 56° S. to an unknown N. lat., and consists of two great divisions, North and South America, which are connected by the isthmus of Darien, or Panama. The whole continent is upwards of 9000 miles in length; but from 1500 to 1800 miles in average breadth. It contains the number of square miles at 14,622,000; Hassel, at 17,303,000. The principal ranges of mountains are the Alleghany, Rocky, Cordilleras, and Andes. The principal rivers are the St. Lawrence, Mississippi, Missouri, Rio del Norte, Colorado, Arkansas, Red river, Ohio, Amazon, La Plata, Orinoco, Paraguay, Madeira, &c. In 952, the Icelanders made a voyage to some portions of the northern coast of this continent; but it remained unknown to Europe till 1492, when it was discovered by Christoval Colon, (Christopher Columbus,) a native of Genoa. It was visited by Amerigo Vesputici, in 1497, from whom it took its name. The climate of this continent generally differs from that of the eastern continents by a greater predominance of cold. It is calculated that the heat is at least ten degrees less than in the same parallels in the eastern continent. It abounds in almost all the varieties of the animal, vegetable, and mineral productions. The inhabitants may be divided into three classes: whites, descendants of Europeans, who have emigrated to the country since its discovery; negroes, mostly held in slavery, and descendants of Africans, stolen from their native land; and Indians, who are aborigines. Humbolt estimates the Indians at . . . . . 8,600,000

Negroes, . . . . . 6,500,000
Mixed races, . . . . . 6,500,000
Whites, . . . . . 13,500,000
The whole amount is over . . . . . 35,000,000
some estimate it . . . . . 40,000,000
There is yet space and fertile soil for more than 500,000,000. The numbers of those who speak in different languages are thus distributed:—
English language, . . . . . 11,647,000
Spanish, . . . . . 10,174,000
Portuguese, . . . . . 3,740,000
Indian languages, . . . . . 7,593,000
French language, . . . . . 1,242,000
Dutch, Danish, Swedish, and Russian, . . . . . 216,000

A great part of the island of Barbadoes is inhabited by the population of Mexico, Guatemala, and the states of South America.
ANLAMGODDE, or ANLAMGOODY; a town on the S. W. coast of Ceylon, near a small river of the same name.
The Rev. William Read, of the L. M. S., commenced his labors here in 1805; and subsequently became pastor of the Dutch church, and superintendent of schools. The Wesleyan missionaries at Galle take a part of their field of labor, and have a school of forty-six boys under regular Christian instruction. Carolus Rodrigo, the first master; is a pious member of the society, and is a local preacher. A very neat and substantial school-house has been erected by the natives. Two young men, belonging to the school, have died in the triumphs of the Christian faith.

ANGUILLA, or SNAKE ISLAND, the most northerly of the Caribbee Islands, lies between the English Harbor, in the W. Indies; it is so named from its winding figure, and is 60 miles N. W. of St. Christopher's. W. lon. 63° 10', N. lat. 13° 12'.

The W. M. S. have a flourishing mission on this island. "The attendance on the various means of grace has been good, and the piety of many of our people is truly exemplary. They last year assisted in the erection of a neat and comfortable chapel at the Rock, and have this year contributed toward the erection of a much larger and more commodious one in the valley. Thirteen members, (in 1830,) were removed to another world, some of them in the triumphs of Christian hope. The net increase of members is forty-three."

ANTIGUA; one of the Caribbee islands, 16 miles long and 12 broad, and 60 E. by S. of St. Christopher's. It has several good ports; and in that called the English Harbor, on the S. E. side, are a royal navy yard and arsenal. It is destitute of fresh water, and the inhabitants save rain water in cisterns. It was taken by the French in 1782, but restored in 1783. Population, 2000 whites; 30,000 slaves; 4500 free blacks; total, 36,500. Sir Patrick Ross, governor. It is divided into six parishes and eleven districts.

Antigua is the seat of government for the Leeward islands. Its legislature is composed of the commander-in-chief, a council of twelve members, and an assembly of twenty-five. This legislature presided to the sister islands the first example of the melioration of the criminal law respecting negro slaves, by giving the accused the benefit of a trial by jury, and allowing, in cases of capital conviction, four days between the time of sentence and the execution. The capital is St. John's. It lies in W. lon. 62° 9', N. lat. 17° 4'.

On the 17th of January, 1759, Samuel Isles, one of the United Brethren, set sail for Antigua, accompanied by the governor and some proprietors, he commenced his labors; but heavy trials awaited him, which soon clouded his prospects.

In the year 1761, however, a piece of ground was purchased in the town of St. John's, for the purpose of a missionary establishment, and a place of worship was erected for the accommodation of the negroes.

Three years after, Samuel Isles was removed by death from the scene of his labors; and for about five years the mission continued in a very languishing state; but at the expiration of that time, a missionary, named Brown, arrived, and his labors were so abundantly blessed, that it soon became necessary to enlarge the church; and on that occasion the zeal of the converted negroes was most pleasingly demonstrated. On coming to the evening meeting, each individual brought a stone, and other materials with him; the different departments of the work were divided among such as were masons and carpenters; and those who could not assist in enlarging the edifice, provided refreshments for the builders; so that the requisite alteration was completed by the voluntary labor of these poor slaves, after the completion of their respective daily tasks.

On the 11th of July, 1823, the United Brethren celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of the opening of their church at St. John's; when it appeared that there had been baptized and received into the congregation at that town, 16,099 negroes, young and old; and that 35 male, and as many female, missionaries had been employed in the important service of making known to their benighted fellow-creatures the way of salvation. And it was stated by Rev. C. F. M. that during the two last Easter 1823 and Easter 1823, 403 adult negroes had been baptized or received into the congregation at St. John's; 104 at Grace Hill; 40 at Grace Bay; 115 at Newfield; and 89 at Cedar Hall; forming a total of 765 in the year; and during the same period, 482 were admitted, in the different settlements, to the holy communion.

In the year 1760, Nathaniel Gilbert, Esq., who had experienced the saving power of the gospel in England, became a resident of this island; and whilst deploring the spiritual condition of the persons by whom he was surrounded, he felt an earnest desire for their welfare. His first efforts were confined to a few individuals, whom he invited to assemble in his own house on the Sabbath day; but finding his exertions were evidently blessed of God, he went forth boldly, and preached the gospel to the poor benighted negroes, notwithstanding the situation he held as speaker of the house of assembly.

Mr. Gilbert continued to labor, without any abatement of arduity, or any diminution of success, till the period of his decease; but as he had no means of appointing a successor in his spiritual office, his beloved flock were left as sheep without a shepherd for nearly twenty years. In 1778, however, Mr. John Baxter, a member of the Wesleyan connexion in England, removed to Antigua, for the purpose of working as a shipwright in the service of government; and shortly after his arrival took upon himself, in the intervals of his employment, the care of the remaining members of Mr. Gilbert's society.

Through the superintendance of Mr. Baxter, the assistance of Mrs. Gilbert, and the subordinate instrumentality of an old Irish emigrant, who had been providentially led to the island towards the close of 1783, things went on prosperously; so that these individuals had under their care upwards of 1000 members, chiefly blacks, who appeared to be earnestly stretching forth their hands towards God. Many new places were opened, and requests were made for preaching, with which Mr. Baxter could not possibly comply.

In the month of January, 1787, Dr. Coke, after mature deliberation, resolved that Mr. Warrener, one of the missionaries originally appointed to Nova Scotia, should remain in Antigua; and Mr. Baxter avowed his determination of resigning the lucrative situation which he held as mercer stock-keeper, in English Harbor, for the express purpose of devoting himself unreservedly to the work of the ministry.

Two years afterwards it appeared that Mr. Warrener, during the comparatively short period of his residence on the island, had been made the instrument of adding 1000 members to the society, who were dwelling together in the spirit of love.

In April, 1816, the island of Antigua was placed under martial law, in consequence of an insurrection which had recently broken out in Barbadoes. Mr. Woolley, one of the Wesleyan missionaries, on hearing that the militia of the colony was called out, went, in company with his colleagues, to the president, and offered their services in any way that might be deemed beneficial to the government. "His honor," says Mr. Woolley, "thanked me for the offer, and observed that we could render more important service than that of bodily exercise. I assented to him, and did not notice on our part should be wanted, or do away any bad impressions which the present painful report might have produced. It is not more strange than true, that some persons think religion seditious, and that the implantation of religious principles in the minds of the negroes is calculated to bring about revolt. The subjects of such sentiments, however, are ignorant of the nature of religion, and utter strangers to its influence. One gentleman who entertained such notions, and disapproved his negroes, and told them what had happened at Barbadoes; when, to his astonishment, they observed, 'Massa, dem no have religion den.' I have been at some pains to discover whether any of our people's minds had received an unfavorable bias from the alarming reports in circulation; and am happy in being able to state, that I found in them no disposition even to murmur at their situation, much less to rebel. One well-informed gentleman, whom I inquired, took up a book, and said, 'Sir, with this book in your hand, you will do more to prevent rebellion than all the king's men.'"

ARCOT; a city of Hindostan, the nominal capital of the Carnatic. In the vicinity are celebrated temples, visited by numerous pilgrims; 57 miles from Madras. E. lon. 79° 29', N. lat. 12° 52'.

The missionaries at Bellary, connected with the L. S., have been useful to the inhabitants, by the distribution of tracts.
ARCOIS; the capital of Arcolis, the eastern region of Peloponnesus, in Greece. The city has retained its name since 1800 B. C. In 1825, a high school and a monitorial school were established here. In May, 1834, Mr. Riggs, of the A. B. C. F. M., came to reside in this city. One of his objects is to establish female schools. The location of the city affords many advantages.

ARKANSAS; a territory of the United States, bounded N. by the territory of Missouri, E. by the Mississippi, which separates it from the states of Tennessee and Mississippi, S. by Louisiana and Mexico, and W. by Mexico. Length from E. to W., 550 miles; mean breadth about 220 miles; square miles about 120,000; between lon. 90° and 100° W.; lat. 32° 4' and 36° 30' N. This is the usual statement of the size of the territory; but the limits of what is properly called Arkansas territory have been lately reduced, so that it now contains about 45,000 square miles. Population in 1810, 106; in 1820, 14,273; slaves 1617; in 1830, 30,385, of whom 4578 are slaves. It is divided into 23 counties. Little Rock is the seat of government. The Arkansas flows through a central part, the Mississippi forms the eastern, and the Red river a part of the southern boundary. The country between the Ozark mountains and the Mississippi is a low level, and in many places liable to inundation. To the S. W. of these mountains, the country consists mostly of extensive prairies without trees except on the borders of the streams of water. The soil on the rivers is exceedingly fertile, but in other parts much of it is sterile. There is in general a great scarcity of water. The climate is subject to violent extremes of heat and cold, and is unhealthy to new settlers. The Arkansas river is navigable for boats in some seasons 1800 miles; in many places below its windings is 2170 miles. The principal tribes of Indians in this territory are the Osages, Cherokees, Choctaws, Quapaws, Cadoes, &c. Missions have been established among some of these tribes, which we shall notice under their appropriate heads.

ARMENIA. Armenia is an inland country, and extends about 430 miles in longitude, and about 300 in latitude. Its western boundary is not far from the Black Sea, and its eastern is the Caspian Sea. The famous Aras, (Araxes,) the Tigris, and other rivers, have their sources in Armenia. In its most flourishing period, the country was divided into fifteen provinces. In the centre was the province of Arrarad, (Ararat,) distinguished for its extent and fertility. The Armenians are known at the present day only as a scattered race. They are found in almost every part of Turkey, Persia, and also Russia, Poland, and many other parts of Europe. They are great travellers, and almost every fair or mart from Leipzig and London to Bombay and Calcutta is visited by them. The whole number of Armenians has been estimated at 10,000,000. Rev. Messrs. Eli Smith and H. G. O. Dwight, of the A. B. C. F. M., have recently published a valuable journal of travels into Armenia. Missions will probably be soon attempted.

ARROO; five islands in the Indian ocean, to the S. and W. of New Guinea, extending from 5° 30' to 7° 0' S. lat., with narrow channels between them. Population, between 19,000 and 20,000 souls.

The inhabitants being very desirous to receive Christian instruction, Mr. Kam, of the L. S., sent them a native teacher, who had been previously prepared for the employment, at the seminary which he had created for the purpose, in Amboyna.

ARORANGI; an outstation of the L. M. S. on the Hervey islands. Paapeia, native teacher.

ASIA, forms the eastern and northern part of the old world, and is separated from Australia by the Indian and Pacific oceans; from America on the N. E. by Cook's or Behring's straits, and on the E. by the Pacific ocean; from Africa by the Arabian sea, and the Red sea, with the straits of Babelmandel; from Europe by the Black sea, sea of Azof, the sea of Marmora, &c. The area of Asia is estimated at 16,175,000 square miles. It extends from 26° to 190° E. lon., and from 2° to 75° N. lat. Its greatest breadth is 4140 miles, and its greatest length 8000 miles. It is four times larger than Europe. It has the highest mountains on the globe, the Himalaya chain, which are said to reach an elevation of 27,677 feet. The population is estimated at from 300 to 580 millions. The Tartar Caucasian race inhabit W. Asia; the Mongolian E. Asia; and the Malay S. Asia. Mohammedanism prevails in the W.; the religion of the Lama in the E., and that of Bramah in the S.

ASSAM, or ASHAM; a country between Bengal and Thibet, 700 miles in length, by about 70 in breadth. It is intersected by the Bramapootra, and several other rivers, and is very fertile. The inhabitants are genuine Hindoos. No European merchant is permitted to settle in the country without the previous permission of the East India company.

The Serampore Baptists established a mission in this country in 1829. James Rae, missionary. (See GOAPATY.)

ASTRACHAN, or ASTRAKHAN, a vicerealty of the Russian empire, extending from 46° to 52° N. lat., containing 293,000 square miles, with 2,000,000 inhabitants, is divided into three governments. It is bounded N. by the country of the Bulgarians and Bashkeers; S. by the Caspian sea; W. by the Wolga; E. by a long chain of mountains, which separates it from Tartary. The summer is long and very hot; the winter lasts three months, and is very severe. The capital, Astrachan, is 31 miles from the entrance of the Wolga into the Caspian. It is the see of a Greek archbishop, and of an Armenian bishop; has 25 Greek, 2 Armenian churches, 26 Tartar mosques, one Indian temple, a high school, a seminary for priests, a botanical garden, and many manufactures. It contains 3,500 houses, and 30,000 inhabitants, beside 20,000 people, who spend a part of the year there on account of the fisheries.

The Rev. Messrs. William Glen, John Dickson, John Mitchell, and Macpherson Selby, from the Scottish M. S., commenced their labors here in 1814. The original design of this mission was to print and distribute tracts, and portions of the Scriptures, in various languages. Its situation is peculiarly favorable for this purpose, being the mart for Persia and numerous other merchants, who assist in extensively circulating these publications. From 1815 to 1822, the missionaries distributed about 40,000 copies of tracts, Testaments, and portions of the Scriptures, in the following languages and dialects, viz. Hebrew, Tartar, Turkish, Persian, Armenian, Calmuc, Jagatal Tartar, Orenberz Tartar, and Turkish Tartar. Thus truth has been disseminated, and the fruit begun to appear.

Mr. Glen expected to finish the translation of the prophetic books into Persian in the course of the summer of 1831. Some delay was occasioned by the confusion into which the city was thrown by a violent attack of the cholera. Of this awful visitation Mr. Glen writes on the 27th of August, when this disease, having continued its ravages twenty-eight days, had disappeared. "Some time since the city was visited by a pestilence, in the memory of the present generation at least. The shops were almost all shut, and an universal gloom sat on the faces of the inhabitants. From five to six thousand in thirty days fell victims to it. One-half of the adults were more or less affected by it. Some were cut off almost instantaneously. In one day five hundred were interred; and on another, four hundred and eighty."

BADDAGAMME; a village in the S. W. part of Ceylon, about 12 miles from Galle, on the river Girinrah, one of the largest in the island. Population, in 1802, 1500. At this time the city was full of mad and sick. Villages of the same kind are extensive in the neighborhood. The situation is healthy, and affords the missionaries easy access to the natives.

Here is a station of the C. M. S. The Rev. Mr. Mayor, having obtained a tract of land from the government, erected a comfortable house on an eminence, which commands a delightful prospect of a winding river, a fertile valley, well-cultivated fields, and distant mountains. Here, on the Lord's day, he had sometimes an opportunity of addressing about 100 children, besides adults; and the latter appeared to be gradually losing their confidence in their heathen superstitions. Some of them, indeed, ingeniously confessed, that the doctrines of Christianity were more reasonable, and better adapted to the wants of man, than the religion of Buddha. The priests, however, were so well convinced that it was their own interest, to uphold the ancient system of delusion, that they were almost invariably found, upon all occasions, to resist every argument adduced in support of the truth. This branch of the mission was afterwards strengthened by the labors of Mr. Ward, who removed hither from Nellore, as the climate at the latter place was found unsuitable to his constitution.

On the 14th of February, 1821, the foundation-stone of a church was laid; the stones for which were blasted from a rock, at the expense of 700 pounds of powder. A great number of natives were present at the service. About four months afterwards, Mr. Ward was requested to visit a young woman on her dying bed, who said that she had heard of Jesus Christ at Baddagamme, and that she trusted in him alone for the salvation of her soul. Messrs. Trimmell and Fought are now at

The station at Astrachan was in a great measure relinquished seven or eight years ago, when most of the missionaries returned to England. Mr. Glen only was left to carry on a translation of the poetical and prophetic books of the Old Testament into Persian, on account of the British and Foreign Bible society; but as his engagement with that society is expected to terminate about the close of the present year, 1834, the directors, in consequence of the inadequacy of funds to support their present expenditure, have resolved to relinquish Astrachan as a field of missionary labor.

ATHENS. This was the capital of the old kingdom of Attica, in Greece, and was founded by Cecrops, 1550 B. C. Modern Athens lately contained 1300 houses, and 12,000 inhabitants, 2000 of whom were Turks. The Greeks here experienced from the Turk a milder government than elsewhere. In 1822, the Acropolis, after a long siege fell into the hands of the free Greeks.

Efforts have been made by various missionary societies to establish schools in Athens. In 1831, Rev. Jonas King, D. D., of the A. B. C. F. M., removed from Tenos to Athens, and opened a Lancasterian school for both sexes, at the head of which he placed Nikeitios, formerly master of the orphan school at Egina. On the 30th of May, 1831, this school contained 176 scholars of both sexes. Mr. King will be amply furnished with books from the mission press at Smyrna. He thinks that it will soon be desirable to establish a college in this renowned seat of ancient learning. He has sent to this country a powerful appeal in favor of this object.

Dr. King remains in Athens. Mr. Riggs has lately removed to Argos, in Peloponnesus. Athens is now the seat of government. The schools are less in number, but higher in character, than formerly. The best models of Christian schools and school books are enjoyed by the Greeks in the most interesting period of their history. There are two schools for males, the Evangelical Gymnasium, and the Elementary school, both planned with a view to a systematic course of instruction. The first contains 66 scholars, and the latter 80 or 50. The Greek government have determined to adopt our school books, published till lately at Malta.

The American Episcopal mission, under the care of Mr. Hill, is continued under favorable circumstances at Athens.

ATIU; one of the Hervey islands, where four teachers of the L. M. S. are stationed. Their exertions have been greatly blessed. The settlement, formed in a healthy part of the island, has a fine appearance. A large new chapel, capable of containing 1800 or 2000 people, with neat and substantial houses for the chiefs and teachers, have been erected, and the people were building substantial dwellings for themselves. About 600 persons have been baptized, and 200 admitted to the sacrament, and the sacrament of the Lord's supper administered by Mr. Williams to twenty persons. The state of the people in every respect is very encouraging.

AUSTRALASIA, or AUSTRALIA; the fifth division of the globe. The South sea and the Pacific ocean, between the eastern shore of Asia and the western shore of America, contain all the islands of Australia, which occupy a space of 130° in length, and 85° in breadth, as they extend from 50° S. to 35° N. lat., and from 95° to 230° E. lon. The area is about 3,500,000 square miles. New Holland alone is almost equal in extent to Europe.

AUSTRAL ISLANDS; five islands, in 24° S. lat., 149° W. lon. Under the care of the L. M. S. fifteen Tahitian teachers are employed. About 600 persons have been baptized, and 200 admitted to the communion. The various islands will be noticed in order.

AVARUA; an outstation of Rarotonga, one of the Hervey islands, under the care of the L. M. S. Aaron Buzacott, missionary.

AVA; a station of the A. B. B. in Bornea. Messrs. Kincaid and Cutter, missionaries, and their wives; two native assistants. This city is the capital of Bornea, and the residence of the king. It was occupied by the missionaries in 1822 to 1829, then suspended, and recommenced May 30, 1833. The missionaries, on their first visit, in their passage of 54 days up the Iravaddy, preached the gospel in nearly 300 cities and villages, and distributed about 15,000 tracts and portions of Scripture. The missionaries have visitors every day; some days 40 or 50. There are one or two inquirers.

B.

this station, with 7 native assistants; 300 children sometimes attend church. The average attendance in 13 native towns is 275.

BAGDAD; capital of a Turkish pachalik of the same name, lat. 32° 20' N. lon. 41° 32' E. The great part of the city lies on the eastern bank of the Tigris, which is crossed by a bridge of boats 620 feet long. The old Bagdad, the residence of the caliphs, with 2,000,000 pop., now in ruins, was situated on the western bank of the river. The modern city was surrounded by a brick wall, about six miles in circuit, and with a ditch, from five to six fathoms deep, which may be filled with water from the Tigris. Bagdad is inhabited by Turks, Persians, Armenians, Jews, and a small number of Christians. The natives compose three-fourths of the whole population. Inclusive of the Arabs, Hindoos, Afghans, and Egyptians, who are accustomed to reside here, the population may amount to 80,000. Bagdad is an important mart for Arabian, Indian, and Persian productions, as well as for European manufactures. A splendid view is afforded by the bazars, with their 1,200 shops filled with oriental goods.

Near the close of 1829, Mr. A. N. Groves, of Exeter, England, with his wife and two sons, and Mr. Kito, who was formerly at Malta, under the C. M. S., sailed from England to commence a mission in Persia. They were conveyed to St. Petersburg, in the Osprey, at the expense of Messrs. Parnell and Paret, who took up the vessel for that purpose, and accompanied him on the voyage. Mr. Groves proceeded by way of Tiflis, in Georgia, to Shusha, a settlement of the German Missionary society, and thence to Tubreez, in Persia. From this place, accompanied by Mr. Pfänder, one of the German missionaries, he performed a tedious and dangerous journey of 30 days to Bagdad. There the missionaries experienced much kindness from major Taylor, bay; 5000 or 6000 inhabitants. James Mitchell and John Stevenson, of the S. M. S., are employed at this place.

BARBADOS; the easternmost of the Caribbee islands, 21 miles long and 14 broad. The exports are sugar, rum, cotton, and ginger; and it has most of the fruits common to the climate. The sugar exported hence is finer than that of any other plantation; and it has a production called Barbaoloe tar, which exudes from crevices in the clay hills on the E. coast, and is collected on the surface of water, in holes dug for the purpose. This island always belonged to the British, who colonized it in 1624; and it remained private property till settled to the crown in 1663.

In 1765, two of the United Brethren sent to this island to commence a mission. One of them, however, died soon after his arrival; his companion, seduced by the love of the world, neglected and finally abandoned the cause; and a third, who was sent to fill up the place of the first, followed him shortly after to the tomb. In May, 1767, Mr. Benjamin Bruckshaw arrived, and his design being approved by the president of the council and the resident clergy, he began immediately to preach to the negroes at Bridgetown, with the consent of many of the planters, who not only permitted their slaves to hear the gospel, but occasionally encouraged the missionaries by their own attendance.

In the month of August, Mr. Bennett came from North America. He was soon joined by other laborers; and as the hearers were continually increasing, they purchased and fitted up a building, both as a place of worship and a dwelling-house.

The missionaries have recently been visited with a severe calamity. On the 10th and 11th of August, 1831, a dreadful hurricane swept over the island, and transformed it into a desert. About 7 o'clock on Wednesday evening, the sky assumed an unusual appearance. "The wind continued to increase," says Mrs. Morrish, the wife of one of the missionaries, "and blew cold. My husband and myself retired to rest between 10 and 11 o'clock. About 12, the storm, blowing tremendously from the west, awoke us. Brother Bennett was called on our roasters; and brother Morrish proceeded with him to examine the doors and windows of the house, to ascertain that all was secure, this being a point of great importance; for if the hurricane once gets entrance, it carries all before it. We now repaired to the hall, which is in the centre of the building. It was well we did so; for, in a short time, our apartments were a mere wreck. At this time, the storm was raging with frightful fury from the west, forcing in the rain, which fell in torrents, at every crevice, till the floor of our hall was covered. The brethren having returned to us from a second attempt to secure the weaker parts of the building, we all knelt down and commended ourselves in earnest prayer to the Lord, imploring him, that whether it was for life or for death, our minds might be kept stayed upon him. Just then succeeded a portentous calm, which lasted about 15 minutes. Alas! it was but the calm of fresh force. Loud roars and noises attracted our attention; and upon opening the door we found the white people and the negroes from an adjoining estate, half naked, and drenched in rain; their dwellings had been entirely destroyed, and they had hardly escaped with their lives. We had just time to supply them with dry clothing, and to collect our own negroes around us, whose huts had been blown down, when the tempest recommenced from the opposite point, with redoubled violence. We were expecting every moment that the walls would give way. We of the missionary family cling to one another, as if we would enter eternity together."

On the abatement of the storm, the brethren ventured out. Nothing appeared but one scene of ruins. The church and school-room were both gone. At Mount Tabor, the other station, the church and mission-house were both entirely destroyed. The ruins of buildings were strewn in all directions.

The number of persons who were killed in this hurricane, on the island, amounted to 5000. The garrison lost from 40 to 50 soldiers, killed, besides a great number wounded. The young cane and provision crops were entirely destroyed. All the poorer class of whites and colored people, whose little sheds were a perfect mass of ruins, were subjected to great suffering.

Mr. Pearce began the Wesleyan mission, in 1791, Mr. Lumb succeeded Mr. Pearce, but his labors were attended with very little success; though permitted to attend 25 estates in the country, which he regularly visited once a fortnight.

In March, 1801, however, Mr. Hawshaw, who was proceeding to another place, in company with some other ministers, came to an anchor at Bridgetown, and went on shore, expecting to spend a few hours with the missionary; but, to his great surprise, he found that the preacher had locked up the chapel, sent the key into the country, and retired, about three weeks before, either to Antigua or St. Christopher's. Several of the people, who were lamenting the loss of their privileges, earnestly entreated Mr. Hawshaw to remain, and he complied with their request. His labors were attended with considerable success.

In 1818, the mission was recommenced; and, in the ensuing year, a new and commodious building was erected; toward it several of the principal inhabitants contributed liberally; it was licensed by the governor's special authority. Prejudice appeared to be giving way, and he animated the bosoms of the laborers.

In 1820, Messrs. Shrewsbury and Larcum thus wrote: "Our prospects at present cannot be deemed faltering, but they are certainly brightening, as there is more likelihood of prosperity than was ever previously known in Barbadoes. On Sunday evenings our chapel is thronged, and multitudes crowd about the door to squeeze in, when there is the least opening. Besides our labors in Bridgetown, we have three estates in the country, at which we preach once a fortnight."

In 1826, the mission-house in Bridgetown was rebuilt. On the 24th of May, 1830, the new chapel in Bridgetown was opened for divine service, and the congregations are respectable. Four weekly prayer meetings are held; 120 persons on Sunday evenings our chapel is thronged, and multitudes crowd about the door to squeeze in, when there is the least opening. Besides our labors in Bridgetown, we have three estates in the country, at which we preach once a fortnight. The average number attending on Sabbath forenoon is about 200. On Thursday evenings, 100.

In the early part of the last century, general Codrington bequeathed the Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts a revenue for the religious instruction of the natives, and the other Caribbee islands and for erecting and endowing a college at Bridgetown; and special, requiring the religious instruction of the slaves on these estates. The society complied with these conditions, and the result has been a pious. The negroes on these estates were quiet during the dreadful insurrection in 1816, in which about 1000 negroes were massacred, either as actual insurgents, or on unfounded suspicion.

The C. M. S. has had for some years a school in Barbadoes, which the lord bishop has recently taken under his own charge; it contained, in 1825, 114 boys and 44 girls, making a total of 158 scholars; of whom 81 were slaves and 77 free; 6 of them were admitted to confirmation.

BARBUDIA, or BRITAIN; one of the British Caribbee islands in the West Indies, with 2000 inhabitants, breadth 12 miles, length 12; lon. 61° 50' W. W. lat. 175 44' N. It belongs to the heirs of general Codrington, who obtained a grant of it for his important services to the crown of England in the West Indies, and is said to yield about 5000*l.* a year. At his death, in 1710, he bequeathed a large part of the island to the Society for Propagating the Gospel, for its instruction of the negroes in this and the neighboring islands, the Christian religion, and for erecting and endowing a college in Barbadoes. The Wesleyan missionaries have labored here with some success. Population, 1500.

BARRIPORE; a small town 31 miles S. E. of Serampore. A mission was commenced here by the Serampore Baptists in 1829. C. C. Rabeholm, missionary; Teran, native assistant. Two native assistants have died in the faith, after having labored with great fidelity.

BARTHOLOMAEW; one of the British Caribbee islands in the West Indies, and it is the only spot in the West Indies possessed by them. The chief exports are cotton, drugs, and lignum vitae, and it has a good harbor, called Gustavia. W. lon. 63° 40', N. lat. 17° 46'.

This was one of the first stations of the W. M. S. The Rev. Mr. Dace labored here ten years, and was called to his reward in 1816. The governor, and most of the respectable ministers, were his attendants; and he was the first planter in which he was engaged in the West Indies, Mr. Dace was deservedly esteemed. A few days after his death, a dreadful hurricane completely destroyed the mission chapel and dwelling-house; a loss which, it was hoped, would in great part be repaired by the exertions of the friends of the mission there.

In a recent report of the W. M. S. it is said, "Since the opening of our chapel, the congregations have been nearly double; and we are gratified to find that the number of converts is increasing, that they are here." The obligations we have been under to the government for the use of the Swedish church, so long enjoyed by our people, call for our sincere gratitude. We have had during the year an increase of 32 members, most of whom are walking in the comforts of the Holy Ghost. The number in society is—whites, 18; free colored, 187; slaves, 98; total, 303. Number of scholars is—boys, 52; girls, 54; total, 136. See also the last report of the W. M. S.

BASLE, or BALZ, the largest town in Switzerland, has 16,400 inhabitants. Lon. 7° 31' E., lat. 47° 40' N. It has a celebrated university, with an excellent library.

A seminary was established here in 1815, for the education of missionaries to the heathen. Its origin and progress were thus described, in 1822, by the Rev. Mr. Blumhardt, its inspector: "The first missionaries to the East Indies, and for erecting and endowing a college in Barbadoes. The Wesleyan missionaries have labored here with some success. Population, 1500. The spirit of missions first struck its roots in the hearts of some Christian friends at Bale, in Switzerland. In this eventful year, a Russian army encamped on one side of our town; and, on the other side, the fortress of Huningen began to pour out a dreadful torrent of bombs against our dwellings. In these sorrowful moments, the Lord of the elements sent a very violent east wind, which had a wonderful effect on the fire of the enemy. The flames were extinguished in the air, and they could not reach the homes, without injury to any life of the inhabitants. While the fire of the fortress was, in this remarkable manner, quenched by the wind of God, a holy flame of missionary zeal was kindled in the hearts of some Christian friends. They resolved to establish a missionary seminary, as a monument of this remarkable salvation of the town, and to train up a number of pious teachers for the instruction of the heathen, Mohammedan tribes, who were sent from the interior of Asia to be our deliverers."

"In the first year, 1816, we had only a few rooms, inhabited by a small number of missionary scholars; in the sixth year the blessing of God enabled our committee to build a missionary college. In the first year we had an income of little more than 50*l.*; in the sixth year the blessing of our Lord increased it to about 500*l.* In the first year our society consisted only of a small number of Christian friends, at Bale; by the sixth year more than 40 auxiliary societies had been established in Switzerland, in Germany, and among the Protestants of France."

The term of study is four years, during which time particular attention is given to philology, comprehending the English, Latin, Greek, Hebrew, and Arabic languages; other sciences are embraced, and also a systematic course of theology. The students enjoy privileges in the university of Basle, and the students of the Seminary at Bale, and the hope is indulged, that the increasing liberality of its friends will provide for a much greater number. The government has approved of the design, and afforded the institution its favor and protection.

The number of students in Mr. Blumhardt's seminary is now from 40 to 50. They are enrolled as members of the university, so as to pass by the regular door into the ministry. Prof. Robinson, in his article on the Theological Education in Germany, says, "The missionary seminary at Bale forms a nucleus, around which cluster the affections and the exertions of Christians in the neighboring states of Baden and Wurtemberg. Here is published a quarterly missionary journal, and weekly missionary report, which obtain a wide circulation, and excite a deep interest in the missionary cause."

BATAVIA; a city and sea-port of Java, capital of the island, and of all the Dutch settlements in the East Indies. It is in the form of a parallelogram, 2000 feet long and 3000 broad; and the streets cross each other at right angles. The public edifices consist of the great church, a Lutheran and Portuguese church, a mosque, a Chinese temple, the stadhous, the splenhouse, the infirmary, and the chamber of orphans. The fort is built of coral rock, brought from some of the adjoining islands, and has a fortification of brick. A part of the town wall is built of dense lava, from the mountains in the centre of Java. No stone of any kind is to be found for many miles beyond this city; but marble and granite are brought here from China. The harbor is excellent; and there are canals in the principal streets, planted on each side with trees. Batavia contains a prodigious number of inhabitants, of various countries; and all the goods brought from other parts of the East Indies are laid up here, all they are exported to their places of destination. The city surrendered to a British force in 1811. It was restored to the Dutch at the peace of Paris, in 1814. It is situated on the river Jacatra, amid swamps and stagnant pools, which, with the fog and climate, render the air unwholesome to Europeans. It once contained about 160,000 inhabitants, which do not now amount to 47,217; of whom 14,230 were slaves; 11,354 Chinese; 7720 Batta Europeans, and their descendants. E. lon. 106° 52', S. lat. 6° 8'.

On the 7th of January, 1822, Mr. Medhurst, of the L. M. S., and his family, arrived at Batavia, where they were received with great cordiality by Mr. and Mrs. Slater; and shortly after their arrival, a dwelling-house was built for them on the mission premises. The contiguous nature, belonging to the society, was also brought from the witness of nature to resemble the cultivated grounds in the neighborhood.

Mr. Medhurst now commenced preaching in Chinese four times a week: on the Sabbath morning, at 7 o'clock, in the mission chapel; on Tuesday evening, at a dwelling-house in Batavia; and on the evenings of Thursday and Friday, at two other places. It seldom happened, however, that either of the congregations exceeded thirty persons; and the only apparent effect produced, at this season, was the conversion of the natives, consisted in the temporary conviction of gainstaries, and in the extended concessions of the heathen to the veracity, consistency, and consequent obligations, of what was advanced on moral and religious subjects.

Towards the autumn of this year, the health of Mr. Slater was so much impaired as to render it necessary that he should take a voyage for his recovery. This he accomplished, with the desired effect; but afterwards, he thought proper to dissolve his connexion with the society, the entire weight of the mission at Batavia was thrown upon Mr. Medhurst. That valuable missionary, however, continued to labor with unremitting assiduity and unabated zeal in the cause of his divine Master; and during the year 1823, he established a printing office, which will, no doubt, prove of essential benefit to the mission at this station. The necessary supply of paper and printing materials was obtained from Canton, through the kind intervention of Dr. Morrison; and type-cutters were procured from Singapore.

From the report of Mr. Medhurst, dated October 1, 1833, we learn that 8 religious services are performed every week, at which about 500 persons in all are brought under the sound of the gospel. In addition, occasional services are held at some villages. Marked attention and seriousness characterize all the religious meetings. On the 20th of September, six Malays were admitted to the communion of the Lord's supper. The whole number of books and tracts printed during the year was 15,225, containing 574,058 pages, in six languages. About 95 children are under instruction.

Rev. David Abel, of the A. B. C. F. M., visited Java in 1831, and spent some time very pleasantly and very profitably with Mr. Medhurst.

BATHURST: a new, flourishing, and healthy British settlement in W. Africa, on the island St. Mary, at the mouth of the Gambia, between 13° and 14° N. lat. By means of this settlement a very prosperous commercial trade has been introduced up the Gambia, which is designed to suppress the slave-trade. The river is navigable more than 500 miles; and, in point of commercial importance, this place is expected to become the first British establishment on the coast, as it affords the best intercourse with the interior. Population, upwards of 2000, almost entirely Jaboos and Mandingoes. They are friendly, and many are desirous for religious instruction. They are Mohammedans.

The average attendance on public worship at Bathurst Sunday morning, is 330; Sunday evening, 100; week day, 130. Communicants, 22; candidates, 26; baptisms, 11. Day scholars, 267; evening scholars, 50.

BATHURST: a town in West Africa, on St. Mary's island, at the mouth of the Gambia; inhabitants, 1923 males, and 316 females. W. Fox missionary, of the Wesleyan society. Both the congregations and schools are encouraging. Members, 61. The moral state of the people is evidently much improved.

BATHURST: a station of the W. M. S. among the Hottentots, in the Albany district, South Africa.

BATTICALOE: a small island, about 31 or 32 miles in circuit, on the E. coast of Ceylon. E. lon. 82° N. lat. 7° 45'. Here is a fort. A few English families, and a small village of Mohammedans and Hindoos, are dupes to the vilest superstitions. They mostly speak Tamil. The heathen population is numerous on the adjacent shores, but they are remote and secluded from any other missionary station, the intermediate country being wild and desartous.

Rev. Mr. Auld, of the W. M. S., commenced a mission here in 1824, and rested from his very active and successful labors in the following year; yet, in this short space, he had nearly prepared an extensive circuit. At this time he was the only missionary, from Jaffna on the N. to Matura, 78 S.; a distance of 330 miles. He acquired the Tamil, and preached often and extensively to large and attentive congregations, besides superintending several schools of about 140 scholars; in which he introduced portions of the gospel, copied by the scholars upon their olas, for school books, instead of the books and vain songs of the heathen. He began to see precious fruits of his labors. After his death, the mission was only partially supplied, till 1821, when Mr. Roberts, having previously acquired a knowledge of the Tamil at Jaffna, resumed it.

In 1823, at 5 schools in Batticaloe, there were 121 scholars. John Katts, native assistant. The town is 200 miles N. of Matura by the coast, and 75 S. of Trincomalee. The general aspect of the mission is encouraging.

BATTICOOTTA: a parish in the district of Jaffna, on the northern extremity of the island of Ceylon; 6 miles N. W. of Jaffnapatna, 2 N. W. of Matury, and 3 S. E. of Batticaloe. Previous to the desolating sickness in 1819, the parish contained 1300 families. E. lon. 80° 15', N. lat. 9° 45'.

The Rev. Messrs. Benjamin C. Meigs and James Richards from the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, commenced laboring here in 1817.

Having gained permission of government to occupy the glebe lands at this place, the missionaries commenced repairing the buildings in 1816, and removed their families here in June, 1817.

The mission premises contain nearly 4 acres of land, on which the missionaries found the following appurtenances: a church, dwelling house, 5 other small buildings, 2 yards, a garden, 4 wells, 11 mango trees, and 61 palmyra trees, all belonging to the government of Ceylon.

The church is 171 feet long and 65 wide; the walls, 4 feet thick, are chiefly of coral stones. From one end to the other are 29 massive pillars, 10 feet in circumference, in two rows, supporting 18 fine arches, which are so much higher than the walls as to support the roof. It was built by the Portuguese, in the 15th century, and repaired by the Dutch in 1678. Since the English took possession of the island, in 1795-6, all the buildings had been rapidly decaying, till the missionaries made the repairs. The ravages of time had nearly demolished all that pertained to them of wood.

The church and dwelling-house, according to the custom of the country, are one story high. The latter is 100 feet long and 42 wide; the walls of coral stones, the floors of brick; and, in the time of the Dutch, was the country seat of the second officer in command at Jaffna. In front is the church, about 20 feet distant. At the back of the house, there is a yard enclosed by a wall about 8 feet high. Through one of these is an entrance into the garden, which contains nearly two acres, inclosed by a fine wall of coral stones, laid in mortar, 9 feet high.

The missionaries are as follows: Daniel Poor, Henry Woodward, and James R. Eckard, missionaries; Nathan Ward, M. D., physician; and their wives.

BELGAUM: an outstation of the L. M. S., near Bangalore, in the Mysore country.

BELGAUM: a populous town and military station between Bomlay and Bellary, and 200 miles N. W. of the latter place. The Canara is chiefly spoken here, and in the extensive country between this and Bellary; and the Mahratra between this and Bombay.

Rev. Joseph Taylor, of the L. M. S., accompanied by the native teacher Ryanas, proceeded in September, 1820, from Bellary to Belgaum, for the purpose of commencing a new mission. They were very kindly received by general Pritzel, as well as by several other respectable Europeans, whose solicitations, with those of the general, had, amongst other causes, induced Mr. Taylor to remove to Belgaum. On his arrival, Mr. Taylor conducted public worship, on the Sabbath mornings, at general Pritzel's house; on which occasion, a considerable proportion of the military officers stationed at Belgaum attended. On the Sabbath evenings he preached to the soldiers in the camp. In 1821, Mr. Taylor had succeeded in the formation of two native schools one of which is situated at Belgaum, and the other in the neighboring town of Shawpore. The number of boys under instruction was about 120. At Shawpore, by the kindness of Dr. Miller, of his majesty's 53d regiment, Mr. Taylor had been enabled to provide a covenant school-house.

On the application of general Pritzel, the Madras government granted Mr. Taylor a liberal allowance for his services in the camp; which he generously devoted to the mission. A society, denominated the Belgaum Association, had been formed, as an auxiliary to the Bible, Missionary, and Tract Societies; and the circulation of the Scriptures and religious tracts had been promoted, in five languages. The following is the latest intelligence which has been received of the mission: Inhabitants, 25,000, chiefly Hindoos. Prevalent language, Tamil. Joseph Taylor, W. Beynon, missionaries. Jonas and Solomon, native assistants. Native congregations in the chapel, 45. Adults baptized in June, 1833, 7. Communicants, 21. Several persons earnestly seeking the peace of the gospel. Four journeys of 300 miles each were performed. An English school, with 220 scholars. An English school seminary, formed in 1832, has 20 youths. At a lithographic press, 16,150 tracts have been printed in Mahratra, Canara, and Tamil.

BELIZE: a town in the province of Honduras, in Central America. Here the English have, for a considerable time, kept up establishments, which have rendered them masters of the country. In 1769, the English colonies exported 804,000 feet of mahogany, 250,000 pounds of sarsaparilla, and 10,000 pounds of tortoise-shell, besides tiger and deer skins. At Belize, the W. M. S. have established missions. "The congregations are numerous and attentive; there are some indications of divine influence, and many seem inclined to give themselves to the Lord. Members in society, 178; children in the school, 170."

BELLARY: a town situated in the most northern part of the province of Mysore, and surrounded by numerous populous towns and villages. Here the Rev. J. Hands, from the L. M. S., arrived in April, 1810, and was treated with great respect by the European residents among whom he soon began to celebrate divine service. He had, at first, some great difficulties to contend with in acquiring the Canara language, which is spoken from the borders of the Mahratra, nearly to the bottom of the Mysore. He applied himself, however, so patiently and perseveringly to this study, that he not only soon collected several thousands of words, which he formed into a vocabulary, but also began preparing a grammar, with the assistance of his moonshew who appeared to be a very learned man. The Brahmins in this place are said to be comparatively few in number. Some of these visited the missionary in a friendly manner; a considerable number of country poor, or "beneficent" persons, attended his ministry; and, in some instances, his labors appear to have been successful. One man, in particular, informed him that he had been constrained to commence family worship, both morning and evening.

In 1816, Mr. Hands was joined by the Rev. William Reeve, by which time many schools had been established.

In the course of the summer, Mr. Hands was induced, by the unfavorable state of his health, to take a journey to Madras, which was very beneficial; but, on his return, he found that of his beloved wife he was bereaved. She languished until the 1st of August, 1818, when her diabolical spirit entered "the house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." She was one of the oldest missionaries connected with the L. M. S. in India; having been employed in the work 12 years; first as the wife of the excellent Mr. Des Granges, and afterwards as the beloved partner of Mr. Hands.

The missionaries at Bellary now are John Hands and John Reid; B. H. Paine, printer; Samuel Flavel, and other native assistants. English congregations are large and respectable. At 8 Canarese services held weekly, the average attendance is 40. The Tamil congregations amount on Sundays to 80 regular attendants. Communicants, 19. Candidates, 14. Great encouragements have been experienced in itinerating. In 13 native schools there are 349 children. The issues from the press in 14 months amounted to 36,654 copies.

BENARES; a large district of Hindostan, in the east part of the province of Allahabad. It contains the cities of Benares, Jaunpore, and Meerpore, and was ceded to the English in 1775. The manufactures of this district are numerous, and the chief articles of produce are barley, peas, wheat, sugar, salt, indigo, and opium.

Benares, a famous city, is the capital of the above district, and may be called the Athens of the Hindoos. It is celebrated as the ancient seat of Brahminical learning, and is built on the left bank of the Ganges. Its ancient name is Case, (the splendorful) which the Hindoos still retain; and it is so holy, that many distant rajahs have delegates residing here, who perform for them the requisite sacrifices and ablutions.

Some years since, a Hindoo college was founded here by a late English resident, Mr. Duncan, to encourage learning among the Brahmins, which has recently revived, and is becoming a very important institution. The government allows 20,000 rupees, or 11,100 dollars, annually for its support. The course of study is 12 years, and students are admitted from 12 to 18 years of age. The first annual examination was held in 1820. In 1822, the number of students was 172, more than 100 of whom received no support from the funds.

The C. K. S. has a valuable depot of books in this city.

The Rev. W. Smith was appointed to Benares by the Baptist M. S. in 1816, and pursued his work with much constancy and vigor. Several Hindoos were reclaimed, and many conversions were effected in the name of Jesus; among the rest a Brahmin of the name of Ramesh, whose subsequent concern on behalf of his deluded countrymen was described as happily attesting the sincerity of his profession. The powerful interest excited by the first introduction of the gospel into this famous city appeared in after years not to have wholly subsided. Crowds of attentive Hindoos were said to hear the word; and many conversions occurred, in which eminent impressions were made. Ramesh, a native itinerant, was associated with Mr. S. in his labors; and so much was he respected by the European inhabitants of the city, that they subscribed, almost without solicitation, 1000 rupees to assist him in erecting a small place of worship.

Ramesh, the native assistant, died in the Lord, in October, 1833. Mr. Smith's varied labors have suffered no intermission. Congregations of from 70 to 80, chiefly heathens, attend on Sunday mornings. Many persons call for books and religious conversation. Communicants, 43. Scholars, 58, all of whom read the Scriptures. It is now connected with the Serampore Baptists.

The Rev. Mr. Corrie, having been appointed to the chaplaincy at Cawpore, left Calcutta towards the end of November, 1817, accompanied by Mr. Adington, a native youth, who had been under the care of Rev. Messrs. Greenwell and Robertson, of the C. M. S., and the recently baptized Puz Messuch. They were much aided in their efforts by a liberal native, Jay Narain Ghossaul, giving a large house in the city for a school, and endowing it with 200 rupees per month, (about 300 pounds per annum.) The school was opened on the 17th of July, 1819, and in November, 116 scholars had been admitted, and the school was becoming popular among the natives.

The Rev. Benedict La Roche and the Rev. John Perowne were afterwards appointed to this station.

In 1821, Rev. Mr. and Mrs. Morris arrived at this station, and found the schools in a prosperous state.

"On Sunday, the 18th of April, 1821," says Mr. Morris, "I preached my first sermon in Hindostanee, at the new chapel. I had long ago, as an opportunity offered, endeavored to converse with the heathen, and had now to be able to do so frequently." The bishop of Calcutta passed Sunday, 6th of September, at this station. At an early hour his lordship attended the mission chapel, when Mr. Morris read and preached in Hindostanee, in which tongue the bishop pronounced the blessing.

The church mission enounces W. Smith, John C. Knopp, and Charles B. Leupold, missionaries; Robert Steward, master of the free school; with native assistants. Congregations, 40. Scholars, 247. The work is generally heard with much attention.

On the 6th of August, 1820, Rev. Mr. and Mrs. Adam arrived at Benares as the agents of the L. M. S. Although chiefly employed in English artillery, they, on the Sabbath and Wednesday evenings, in his own dwelling at Secrole, and entered on compiling for the use of the natives, a "Life of Christ;" in which it was his intention to contrast the dignity and purity of our Lord's character with the opposite qualities, as found in the Hindoo mythology.

Concerning this station, Mr. Adam forcibly says:— "Benares exhibits, to full perfection, some of the worst principles of Hindoo superstition. The soul offers its invaluable blessings to the 'poor in spirit'; but these people fancy themselves 'rich, and increase in goods, and having need of nothing.' The Savior is a Savior to them who feel themselves lost; but they fancy themselves already at the 'gate of heaven,' and certain of obtaining an easy admission through it. Add to this, the pride, wickedness of their lives, occasioned or fostered by the local superstitions, and it will easily be perceived that benares presents many and peculiar obstacles, both to the missionary's exertions and to the reception of the Savior. Amid such a population, it is a great blessing to dwell in peace and safety, and to do any thing that may lead, though the effects may be remote, to the important and happy object we may have in view."

In 1826, Mr. James Robertson arrived at Benares, to assist in the work of the mission.

Mr. Robertson died of cholera, on the 16th of June, 1833. W. Byers, Robert C. Mather, and J. A. Schurman are now stationed in this place. Three services are held weekly in the native chapel. A number of persons seem to be sincere inquirers after truth. In 4 schools there are 120 children.

The connexion between Mr. Adam and the society has since been dissolved.

BENGAL; a province of Hindostan, on each side of the Ganges; bounded N. by Boota; W. by Bahar and Orissa; S. by the bay of Bengal; and E. by the Birman empire and Assam; 400 miles long and 300 broad—between 95° and 92° E. lon., and 21° and 27° N. lat. The coast between the Hoogly and the Ganges, 180 miles, is a dreary, inhospitable shore, which sands and whirlpools render inaccessible to ships of burden. Bengal consists of one vast plain, of the most fertile soil, which, in common with other parts of Hindostan, annually yields 2, and in some parts even 3, crops. The rainy season continues from Bengal; and about a month, but the inundations from the Ganges and Burmah proper continue about a month, in the latter part of July and beginning of August. After the waters subside, diseases rage, especially among those who are not accustomed to the climate.

The presidency of Bengal includes several provinces, and yields an immense revenue to the British, who gained possession in 1765. The population is estimated at more than 25,000,000; within the presidency are about 40,000,000. It is peopled by various nations, but the principal are the Moguls, or Moors, and the Hindoos, or Bengalees. The Bengalees and Moors have each a distinct language. The former are idolaters; they generally live in huts built of mud and straw, seldom use chairs or tables, but sit on the ground, and eat with the fingers.

The Dutch possess the town of Chinsurah; the French, Chindernagore, and the Dutch, Serampore. The number of native troops, called sepoys, in 1811, was 579, besides 5875 invalids. No small part of the population are Mohammedans, the descendants of the Afghan and Mogul conquerors, and Arabian merchants, softened, in the course of time, by an intermixture with Hindoo women, converts, and children, whom they purchased, and educated in their own religion. The practice of suttee, or widow-burning, was formerly carried on to a great extent in Bengal, but it has recently been abolished by order of the British.

Bengal has lately been divided, and Agra made a new presidency.

BERBICE; a settlement on a river of the same name, in Guiana, to the W. of Surinam. The land is low and woody. It was taken from the Dutch by the British in 1796, and in 1803; and it was ceded to Britain in 1814. The river enters the Atlantic in Lon. W. 32° 13' N. lat. 6° 25'. Population in 1815, 29,959; of whom 550 were whites, 240 people of color, and 29,159 negroes.

A new and wide door of usefulness appeared to be opening in this colony in the year 1812. Several estates belonged to the British crown, and were under the direction of commissioners, who were disposed to encourage the instruction of the slaves. These gentlemen, who are well acquainted with the valuable services of the Rev. Mr. Wray, of the L. M. S., at Demerara, proposed to him to remove to Berbice, and to defray the expenses of the mission; a proposal in which Mr. Wray and the directors acquiesced.

Persecution, however, afterwards arose; Mr. Wray was soon wholly excluded by the new managers, appointed in consequence of the restoration of about half the crown negroes to the Dutch, and the slaves were prohibited all communication with him. He therefore engaged in the instruction of a large body of slaves, about 300 in number, who belonged to the British government, and resided in the town of New Amsterdam, where they were employed chiefly as mechanics. In the pursuit of this object, he for some time enjoyed the countenance and aid of the British government; but very embarrassing and perplexing difficulties were thrown in his way by persons on the spot, and, with a view to their removal, he was induced to visit England. Mrs. Wray, during his absence, continued to instruct, with great assiduity, the young and female part of his congregation.

For some time prior to the disturbances in Demerara, the prospects of Mr. Wray were brightening, and his sphere of labor enlarging. Just before their occurrence, he had received invitations from several respectable proprietors to instruct the slaves on their estates, one of which contained as many as 1600; and he had just entered into these additional engagements, under highly promising circumstances, when those events occurred, which at once interrupted his labors and exposed him to much unmerited reproach.

Mr. Wray was summoned, on false and injurious charges, to appear before the governor. Here, in the presence of the gentlemen who had brought them forward, he positively asserted his innocence, and requested that his excellency would direct the fiscal to investigate the affair, in order that his innocence might fully appear. With this request his excellency complied, and the result was the entire vindication and most honorable acquittal of Mr. Wray.

Not much more than a fortnight had elapsed, when he was again plunged into trouble, from a very different cause. His chapel, which had been a second time enlarged, was destroyed by fire, together with the school-house. This calamity happened on the 22d of September. Although Mr. Wray's labors were thus greatly circumscribed, he availed himself of such opportunities as were afforded, to communicate Christian instruction both to the slaves and free people. The members of his church, although not increased in number, advanced in piety. On the 1st of March, 1825, the foundation of the new chapel was laid; and it was opened on the 12th of June, when a large and attentive congregation assembled. The collection at the doors amounted to about 162 guineas. His excellency Sir Benjamin D'Urban, governor of the colony of Demerara, kindly presented Mr. Wray with a handsome donation. The debt was reduced, in 1826, by the liberality of gentlemen on the spot, to about 600 guineas, or about 55 pounds sterling.

Mr. and Mrs. Wray visited England, on account of his health, in the summer of 1831. The mission is in a prosperous state. The public services are well attended. The private meetings, where people state their experience, are encouraging; and the desire for instruction is increasing. Scarcely a Sabbath passes in which some do not request to have their names inserted among the catechumens. Contributions for the enlargement of the missionary chapel have been liberally made by all classes of society.

BERHAMPORÉ; a town of Hindostan, in Bengal. It is seated on the Cossimbazar, a miles south of Moorshedabad, and has a fine range of cantonments for troops.

Rev. Micajah Hill, of the L. M. S., removed to this station from Calcutta in 1834. He calculated that circle of 2 miles drawn around him would include a population of about 20,000. After encountering considerable opposition from the natives, arising from a peculiar attachment to the superstitions of their forefathers, he succeeded in establishing 6 schools on the indigenous plan; 4 for the children of Hindus, and 2 for those of Mohammedans; the latter being conducted by Persian moonshies; and Mrs. Hill, after overcoming similar difficulties, established a native female school, in behalf of which she appealed to the European residents at the station, and not without success.

Micajah Hill and James Patterson are now missionaries at Berhampore. Preaching and the regular distribution of tracts are continued. Interesting preaching tours are made.

BERLANAPOTA; a new station of the W. M. S. in Ceylon, where W. A. Lilimon, one of the assistant missionaries, is placed.

BERLIN; a city of Germany, capital of the margraviate of Brandenburg, and of all the king of Prussia's German dominions. It is 12 miles in circuit, surrounded partly by walls and partly by palisades, and has 15 miles; but within this inclosure are numerous gardens, orchards, and fields. The streets are straight, wide, and long; and its large squares, magnificent palaces, churches, and other buildings, are scarcely to be equalled. Berlin is seated on the Spree, from which there is a canal to the Oder, and another to the Elbe on the W. side; that it has a communication by water both with the Baltic sea and the German ocean. It was taken in 1760, by an army of Russians, Austrians, and Saxons, who were obliged to evacuate it in a few days. In 1806, soon after the battle of Jena, the French entered this city, and Buonaparte held a court in the palace. It is 109 miles N. of Dresden, and 185 N. W. of Breslau. E. lon. 13° 22'. N. lat. 52° 31'. Pop. 387,000; in military force, 20,000; and the most encouraging indications appear that the time of mercy towards Israel is approaching.

In 1824, a society for promoting Christianity among the Jews was formed in this city, under the express sanction of the king, and much zeal and liberality is manifested in the cause. A considerable number of Jews have already made a public profession of their faith in Christ.

In 1826, about 1000 persons, of various denominations, resided in Berlin; of whom 61 were baptized in some one of the 4 churches, under the superintendence of a distinguished ecclesiastic, and a member of the committee of the Berlin S. An old and highly respectable Jew said to him, "We are all coming; we cannot hold to Judaism any longer."

The Berlin Missionary Institution was founded in 1800, and is supported by the voluntary contributions of individuals. It is designed to qualify young men for missionary labors, and is under the immediate care of the Rev. Mr. Jenicke, of Berlin. Many faithful missionaries have already gone forth from this school of the prophets.

BERMUDAS, or SOMMERS ISLANDS; four islands in the Atlantic ocean, 500 miles E. of Carolina, and surrounded by numerous rocks and shoals, which render them difficult of approach. They were discovered by Juan Bermudez, a Spaniard, in 1522; but were not inhabited till 1639, when Sir George Sommers was cast away upon them; and they have belonged to Britain ever since. They carry on some trade with America and the West Indies. The principal one is called St. George. They extend from N. E. to S. W. about 45 miles. The north point of these islands lies in lon. 64° 28' W. lat. 32° 22' N. Population, 10,331, of whom 5162 were whites, and 4,919 slaves.

In the beginning of 1739, the Rev. Mr. Stephenson, a native of Ireland, proceeded to these islands. On his arrival, it was quickly known that a Methodist missionary from Ireland was in the harbor; and the report soon made an impression to his disadvantage.

After waiting upon the governor, and laying before his excellency the certificate of his ordination, and the pass which he had received prior to his quitting Dublin, certifying that he was appointed as a missionary to the island of Bermuda, Mr. Stephenson commenced his regular labors, and though at first his hearers were but few in number, and of those the greater part appeared either hostile or indifferent to the subjects introduced to their notice, the violence of prejudice and opposition soon began to subside; the congregation visibly increased; subscriptions were raised for the erection of a chapel; and in the month of April, 1800, 71 whites and 30 blacks had joined the society.

The prosperity which now began to shine upon the infant mission was viewed with a malignant eye by the enemies of religion; and as they found themselves incapable of checking its progress without the aid of law, they procured an edict to be passed by the house of assembly, prohibiting all persons, not ordained according to the rites and ceremonies of the church of England or Scotland, from preaching, or exhorting to any religious assembly, public or private, under penalty of 50 pounds, and 6 months' imprisonment for every offence; and inflicting a similar punishment on the person in whose house the meeting should be held.

Mr. Stephenson, considering this law as hostile to the spirit of toleration, as an infringement upon the birthright of every subject, and as diametrically opposite to the avowed sentiments of the reigning monarch, declining to ministerial labors as formerly; but though he was at length apprehended, carried before the magistrates, and committed to the common goal, to take his trial at the next assizes.

In December, Mr. Stephenson was brought to trial for the crime of having preached the gospel, or, as one of the principal evidences swore, of having read prayers from a book which he held in his hand, and a prisoner till a congregation. And for this high offence he was sentenced to be confined 6 months in the common goal, to pay a fine of 50 pounds, and to discharge all the fees of the court. After he had been imprisoned about 5 weeks, the governor offered to set him at liberty, on condition of his promising to quit the island within 60 days; but, as he conceived such a proposition dishonorable to the cause for which he had hitherto suffered, he declined accepting it, and remained a prisoner till the month of June, 1801, when the period of his incarceration expired.

Mr. Stephenson continued on the island during the remaining part of the year; but his health was so seriously impaired, that he was no longer able to the exertions he had formerly been accustomed to make; and, as the interdiction of the law precluded him from uniting in public or social worship with the members of the society, he was recalled from Bermuda early in 1802, and those who had formerly heard the word of God with gladness were left as sleep without a shepherd.

Applications, in the mean time, had been made to his majesty's government in England, to dissolve the intolerant edict which had driven Mr. Stephenson from the scene of his labors; and though the request of the petitioners was readily granted, nearly 3 years elapsed before the repeal of the act was publicly announced. And even subsequently to that period, such a spirit of determined hostility was exhibited against the introduction of the gospel, that no missionaries could be induced, for some time, to venture among the inhabitants.

At length, in the spring of 1805, Rev. Joshua Matthews sailed from New-Brunswick to Bermuda, with the view of re-establishing the mission. After repeated interviews with the governor, Mr. Marsden was permitted to commence his ministration; and though, at first—he was merely attended by 20 or 30 hearers, his congregation soon began to increase; and, in the beginning of September, he had the satisfaction of uniting about 50 persons in society, most of whom were negroes or people of color, who appeared truly anxious for spiritual instruction. A chapel was afterwards erected, and some of the most respectable persons in the island became regular attendants on the means of grace, whilst others could hardly be restrained by their relatives from uniting with the society.

BETHELSDORP; or Village of Bethel, situated westward of Algoa bay, at the mouth of the Zwartkops river, and about 450 miles E. of the cape of Good Hope. To this station Dr. Vanderkemp and Mr. Read, of the L. M. S., were removed, in consequence of the danger to which they were exposed at Bata's place. Having marked out a plot of ground, 240 paces in length and 44 in breadth, they divided it into different portions for the families under their care, and gave the name of Bethel Fountain to a stream that ran through the middle of the settlement. They then erected a temporary church, and houses for their own accommodation; the walls and roof being constructed of mud, and, in July, 1805, they commenced public worship, and opened a school for the instruction of the young. Nor were the missionaries permitted to labor in vain. Cupido, a man notorious for vice, and distinguished above all his neighbors for the enormity of his crimes, found, in the blood of Christ, a remedy sufficient to heal all his diseases; and when he heard that the Son of God was able to save sinners, he cried out, "This is what I want!" and, in a few days, he was baptized. He soon received the faith of the gospel, that he straightway preached it to his countrymen; and, in one year, he could number of them 17 adults converted by his instrumentality; one of whom became the wife of Mr. Read. Many other instances of usefulness, peculiarly pleasing, also occurred. Just before the recapture of the cape, however, the opposition of many persons had risen to a great height; and the missionaries feared that they should be compelled to relinquish their labors. They were summoned to the cape, where they vindicated their conduct to the satisfaction of the Dutch governor; yet so malignant were their enemies, that he recommended the missionaries to delay their return till a more favorable opportunity. That opportunity was unexpectedly afforded by the capture of Cape Town; for which was no sooner effected, than the general, Sir David Baird, sent for Dr. Vanderkemp, whom he treated in the most cordial manner. Shortly after, full permission was granted to resume the care of the congregation at Bethelsdorp, where the doctor arrived, March 21, 1806. Mr. Read, who was desired by Sir David Baird to return by sea, was preserved from the most imminent danger of being shipwrecked on the coast of Caffraria, and providentially reached the settlement in safety. The efforts of Messrs. Ubricht, Tromp, and Vanderkemp, and Mr. Read, the mission was flourishing; and a valuable acquisition had been found in Mrs. Smith, who formerly lived at Rodezand, and had devoted herself to the instruction of the heathen. The missionaries were received by their beloved flocks with the most enthusiastic tokens of joy. "Even the old Hottentot women, who could scarcely leave their houses, made their appearance," says Mr. Read, "on this occasion, to join the general acclamation of clapping of hands; and I was almost afraid of being smothered by their carresses."

In 1811, Messrs. Wimmer, Verghost, Bartlett, and Coner, (a converted black from Demerara) were added to the laborers at this settlement. Dr. Vanderkemp having long contemplated a mission to Madagascar; but, in the midst of his anticipations of removal to a new sphere, he was summoned to the enjoyment of eternal rest.

The Rev. Dr. Philip, superintendent of the missions of the L. M. S. in South America, having recently returned to his labors from a visit to England, He was received with enthusiastic joy by the Hottentots. Mr. Rolland, one of the French missionaries, gives the following account of a public dinner with which the Hottentots of Bethelsdorp greeted Dr. Philip:—

"The school-house alone was large enough to contain all the guests; who, if we include the children, amounted to about 250. At three in the afternoon, the bell announced that all was ready; and, at this signal, we directed our steps towards the school.

"The first thing that struck me, on entering the room, was two long tables, one with eighty dishes, the other with forty, containing different kinds of meat and vegetables, all dressed in the English manner. That which next drew our attention was the clothes of our guests in France; most of the men wore cloth clothes of different colors: some had short jackets, cotton trousers, and waistcoats of striped calico. The women were clothed in printed cotton, white stockings, and black shoes: the most distinguished were those who waited at table, who had small silk handkerchiefs; and all had silk or red and yellow cotton handkerchiefs which round their heads, very neatly put on. The boys who waited had all white trousers, blue waistcoats, and black cravats; they had a napkin under their arm or upon their shoulder. The cleanliness of those who were seated at table, the good quality of the different meats which were served, and the harmless gaiety which the repast inspired, were well calculated to remove the repugnance which is felt in Europe, when we speak of dining with Hottentots. But, what was more than all, was the promptitude and skillfulness of the boys and girls who waited at table, whether they changed the plates, handed the bread, poured out the beverage, or helped the dishes: they ran, crossed, passed and repassed one another, and acquitted themselves with as much dexterity as the waiters at the hotels of London or Paris.

"You will perhaps think, after all I have told you of this dinner, that we were entirely occupied with our Hotentots in eating and drinking; but you mistake; for at the same time a scene was passing before us which raised our thoughts above material things. We had scarcely begun dinner, when thirty young girls entered, decked in their holiday dress, and placed themselves on a little gallery at the end of the room: they soon began to sing, in chorus, English and Dutch hymns. Nothing could be more sweet and melodious than their voices, for the Hotentots are naturally musicians. I have heard children of four or five years old sing different accompaniments perfectly; and they have, in general, so decided a taste for music, that they will sing a whole day without fatigue. We were delighted to hear these young girls sing the praises of their Creator and Redeemer. Our souls rose to God: we quite forgot our dinner, to give vent to the many feelings to which such a scene gave birth in our hearts. When the young girls had ceased, all the assembly sang a hymn of thanks.

"Soon after, the little children of the infant school entered, and ranged themselves in a circle in the midst of the room, and commenced their exercises under the conduct of a little monitor. Arithmetic, the principles of reading, geometry, mechanical arts, &c., all was executed singing: their motions were appropriated to the words, and the most perfect measure and harmony were observed. We were delighted to see them; and we could not surpass in the pleasure which we felt in seeing a practical application of the execution of which is so easy; in effect, this is one of the most philosophical and useful discoveries which English genius has ever made. Children are, in this manner, brought up with gentleness; their moral and intellectual faculties are developed; they acquire the principles of social life; and their minds are prepared to receive, at a later period, a more extended and enlarged education. Constraint is never employed in this school, and the infants never feel the dislike which generally accompanies their lessons. They go to school with joy, and at their own free will; even the youngest, forgetting the bosom of their mothers, cry to go, and join their songs with those of their little companions; and in going out of school, not contented with what they have done during their lessons, they cheer the village with their songs, and repeat everywhere what they have learned. Dr. Philip, addressing himself to the parents, said that James Kitchingman is now 92, the father who does not love their children visit this school: their hearts will then melt, and they will be constrained to love them. Let the mothers who feel no tenderness for their own, and who know not how to make them obey but with the rod, come here, and they will learn that neither the rod nor constraint is necessary. Many shed tears; and this sight, joined to that of the children before us, presented the most interesting and touching scene that I have ever witnessed in any school. The services are held in Betheldorp. Attendance on public worship is regular. Communicants, 100. Communicants added, 8. Day scholars, 100. Sunday from 180 to 200. Infant scholars, 70. More ground has been brought under cultivation than at any former period.

BETHESDA; a missionary station of the United Brethren in St. Kitt's, one of the West India Islands. Missionaries, Hoch and Seitz.

BEYROOT; a city of Syria, at the foot of mount Lebanon. It is pleasantly situated on the western side of a large bay, in 33° 49' N. lat., and 35° 50' E. lon. It has a fertile soil, and is abundantly furnished with good water from the springs which flow from the adjacent hills. It was anciently called Berytus, from which the idol Bæthyræ is supposed to have had its name. The houses are built of brick and of a soft, sandy, crumbling stone; and are dark, damp, and inconvenient. Ships are forced to lie at anchor at the eastern extremity of the bay, about 2 miles from the city, as the port is choked with sand and pillars of granite. Mount Lebanon is at a short distance on the east, and affords a pleasant resort for the summer. On the south is a large and beautiful plain, varied by small hills, which are covered with orange, palm, lemon, olive, pine, and mulberry trees. On the N. and N. W. Beyroot is entirely open to the sea. Beyroot is the great emporium of all who dwell on the mountains. Since the residence of the English consul in the place, the trade has greatly increased. Besides 3 large mosques and several small ones, the city contains a Roman Catholic, a Maronite a Greek, and a Catholic-Greek church. The population is supposed to be 5000.

In 1823, Rev. Messrs. Jones, Kinzard and Phinck, of A. B. C. F. M., commenced a mission in this place. After laboring with considerable success for several years, the missionaries, Goodell and Bird, on account of a bitter persecution which had been raised by the ecclesiastics, and the political state of the Turkish empire, retired in May, 1828, to Malta. Ten or twelve individuals, one a priest and another an archbishop, had embraced the Christian faith. The excitement on the subject of religion for several months was very great. In the spring of 1830, Rev. Messrs. Isaac Bird and George B. Whiting recommenced the mission. A few young men had remained steadfast in the gospel.

Beyroot is becoming more and more interesting as a missionary station. Isaac Bird, Eli Smith, and George B. Whiting, missionaries, and Asa Dolme, M. D., licensed preacher and physician, with their wives, compose the mission. From 20 to 30 Franks attend the meetings in English at the English consulate. At the mission house there are two services in Arabic on the Sabbath. A congregation of 50 or 60 hearsees continue to assemble. The system of schools is yet in its infancy. The number is 64 taught by native schoolmasters, and 2 by members of the mission. The aggregate of scholars does not exceed 240. Female education is much neglected and opposed.

BIRMAH. The Birman empire before the late war extended from 90° to 26° N. lat., and was about 100 miles long and 700 broad; population, about 18,000,000. In 1824, the Birman forces invaded a province under the protection of the British. Lord Amherst, the governor-general, immediately declared war. Gen. Alexander Campbell entered the country and prosecuted the war so successfully, that in February, 1826, the emperor of Birman made peace by ceding to the East India company four provinces, Arrakan, Merguy, Tavoy, and Yea, and by paying, in addition, about $4,500,000. The country of Assam was made independent, and the important city of Rangoon declared to be a free port. At present, the empire consists of seven provinces. Unne-rapooa, the capital, contains 175,000 inhabitants. Birman is, in general, fertile, though it contains several important vast deserts. In every part it is rich in mountains, and abounds in gold, silver, precious stones, and marble; also in iron, tin, lead, &c. The East India company build vessels of even a thousand tons in the Birman docks. The trade, especially with China, is very brisk, by means of the river Irrawaddy, which extends 1240 miles into the interior, and has populous cities all along its banks. The prince is absolute, but custom obliges him to ask the opinion of the nobles in important state matters. In every Birman part is arithmetic, reading, and writing. The common people write on palm leaves, with an iron style; the rich have libraries, with books, the leaves of which are thin pieces of ivory with gilt edges. The literary Birman translate, from English, various scientific and legal books. The Birman are idolaters, of the sect of Boodh, or, as he is more commonly called, Guadama. The Boodhists believe, that like the Hindoo Vishnu, Guadama has seven incarnations. They do not believe in a first cause; they consider matter as eternal; that every portion of animated existence has in itself its own rise, tendency, and destiny. The religion of Birman is, in effect, atheism; and the highest reward of piety, the object of earnest desire and unrewarded pursuit, is ANNIHILATION.

The first Protestant missionaries who visited Birman were Messrs. Chater and Marston, who went thither from Serampore in 1807. Mr. Marston remained for a few months at the station, and Mr. Chater was joined by Mr. Felix Carey, a relative of Dr. Carey. Mr. Chater remained four years, and made considerable progress in the language. At length, he removed to Ceylon, and Mr. Carey went to Ava. In July, 1813, Rev. Adoniram Judson and his wife, missionaries, under the direction of the American Baptist Board for Foreign Missions, arrived at Rangoon, one of the Birman ports. They immediately commenced the study of the Birman language. In March, 1816, Mr. and Mrs. H. Hough and his wife joined the mission. Dr. Carey and his associates at Serampore made a present of a printing press, types, and other printing apparatus. Two tracts, which had been prepared by Mr. Judson, were immediately printed by Mr. Hough. Soon after a grammar was prepared. In November, 1817, Mr. Edward Wheelock and Mr. James Colman, with their wives, sailed from Boston as a reinforcement to the American Baptist Board. The next day, Mr. and Mrs. Hough, in April, 1819, Mr. Judson commenced preaching. His congregation consisted, on the first day, of 15 persons, besides children. On the 27th June, 1819, the first baptism occurred in the Birman empire. Moug Nat was the name of the convert. In August, Mr. Wheelock, while on a voyage to Calcutta, in a paroxysm of delirium, plunged into the sea, and was drowned. In November, two natives, Moug Thabiah and Moug Baw, were baptized. In March, 1820, Mr. and Mrs. Colman proceeded to Chitragong, to establish a mission. In July, 1822, Mr. Colman fell a martyr to his missionary zeal. In the latter part of 1821, Mrs. Judson, on account of ill health, sailed for her native land by way of England. In December, 1822, Rev. Jonathan D. Price, M. D., and his wife, joined Mr. Judson at Rangoon. Mrs. Judson arrived at New York on the 23rd of September, 1822. In the latter part of 1823, she returned to Birman, in company with Mr. Jonathan D. Price and his wife. The missionaries have now met with encouraging success. Eighteen converts had been baptized, when their prospects were overclouded by the war in which the Birman were engaged with the British. During nearly two years, the missionaries suffered almost incredible hardships. For 19 months, Mr. Judson was a prisoner. On the 24th of October, 1826, Mrs. Judson died. At the close of 1829, 26 persons had been baptized, and, with one exception, had evinced the fruits of a truly Christian obedience by an upright deportment.

Further particulars respecting Birman may be found under TAVOY, RANGOON, MAULMEIN, &C.

BLEST-TOWN; a station of the L. M. S. on the island Eimeo, one of Georgian Islands, in the Pacific ocean. Alexander Simpson, missionary. Elijah Armitage, W. Henry, artisans. Population increases. Eight communicants have been added, and 4 excluded on account of intemperance. The South Sea academy has 13 boys and 9 girls. Most of the young females are able to spin the cotton raised in the islands.

BLACKTOWN. (See MADRAS.)

BOGUE TOWN; a station of the L. M. S. in Tainarpu, or smaller peninsula, Georgian Islands.

The Rev. Mr. Crook settled here, at the request of the inhabitants, at the end of 1822; and he had a congregation of about 500, a church of 47 members, and a flourishing school. In September, 1830, Mr. Crook and his family removed to the colony of New South Wales, on account of the enfeebled state of his own and of Mrs. Crook's health, their large family, and the difficulty of making suitable provision for them in the islands.

BOOK-TABLE; a station of the A. B. C. F. M. among the Western Choctaw. Henry R. Wilson, missionary. Samuel Nonlton and wife, teachers. Communicants, 23.

BOMBAY; a small island near the W. coast, Hindostan, about 7 miles long and 1 wide, near the fort, containing a very strong and capacious fortress, a large and populous city of the same name, a dock-yard, and marine arsenal. It has a very spacious and safe harbor; and is surrounded by the mountains of the Parsoes in 1662, and was then united to the East India company, who retained the possession, in 1668. Toleration is granted to persons of every religious profession. The population has been estimated at 220,000; but a late census gives 161,550, of the following classes:—British, 4,300; native Christians, i. e. Portuguese, Catholics, and Armenians, 11,500; Jews, 800; Mohammedans, 25,000; Parsees, 13,150; Hindoos, 103,800. The Hindoos generally speak the Marhatta; the Parsees the Guzaratee. The climate is unhealthy, and the water brackish. Bombay has an extensive commerce with the neighboring continent and the fertile island of Salsette.

Bombay is a city at the S. E. end of the above island, and one of the three presidencies of the English East India company, by which their oriental territories are governed. It has a strong and capacious fort, a dock-yard, and marine arsenal. Here the finest merchant ships are built, and all of teak, supplied chiefly from Bassen. The inhabitants are of several nations, and very numerous. This city commands the entire trade of the N. W. coast of India and that of the gulf of Persia. It is 156 miles S. of Surat. E. lon. 72° 55', N. lat. 18° 55'.

The missionaries from the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions commenced their labors here in 1813.

This was the first station established by the board. The first missionaries, Rev. Messrs. Newell, Hall, Nott, Judson, and Rice, sailed February, 1812; and, after various wanderings and disappointments, Messrs. Hall and Nott arrived at Bombay in about a year, and were joined by Mr. Newell the year following; before which time, Mrs. Newell died at the Isle of France. Mr. Judson and his wife, and Mr. Rice, became Baptists in Bengal, and left the connexion; and Mr. and Mrs. Nott returned to America, on account of his health, in 1815. About this time Messrs. Hall and Newell, the only missionaries at this station, began to instruct the natives in the principles of Christianity, and to translate the Scriptures and tracts into the Marhatta language; they also established a promising school for European and half-caste children; and, from the first, preached to such as understood English. Rev. Horatio Bardwell and his wife arrived November 1, 1816; about the same time a printing-press was procured from Calcutta, which he was competent to manage; and another valuable addition was made to the mission by the marriage of Mr. Hall to an English lady, who had a knowledge of the Hindoostee, one of the principal languages spoken at Bombay.

In February, 1818, Rev. Messrs. Allen Graves and John Nichols, with their wives, and Miss Philomela Thurston, joined the mission; and, in March following, Miss Thurston was married to Mr. Newell. In January, 1821, Mr. and Mrs. Bardwell left the station and embarked for America, on account of his ill health; and Mr. Newell died May 10th of the same year, a few days before the arrival of Mr. Garrett. He married the widow of Mr. Newell. In 1822, Mrs. Graves embarked for America, for the recovery of her health. She sailed for Bombay, with Rev. Edmund Frost and his wife, in September, 1823.

Mr. Nichols died December 9, 1824; Mr. Frost, October 18, 1825; Mr. Hall, March 23, 1826. Mrs. Hall soon after came to this country, and introduced new disciples. In the list of May, 1834, is Mr. Garrett, who was Mr. Knight, an English missionary; and Mrs. Frost, also, as the wife of Mr. Woodward, of the American mission. In November and December, 1827, Rev. Messrs. D. O. Allen, Cyrus Stone, and their wives, and Miss Cynthia Farrar, joined the mission; Messrs. H. Read, Wm. Ramsay, and Wm. Hervey, in the early part of 1831. Mrs. Allen died on the 5th February, 1831, Mrs. Hervey on the 3d of May, and Mr. Barrett on the 6th of May following. Mrs. Garrett has returned to this country.

We give the following facts in regard to the present state of the mission.

Cyrus Stone, Wm. Ramsay, missionaries. Wm. C. Sampson, missionary printer. Mrs. Ramsay, Mrs. Sampson, Miss Cynthia Farrar, superintendents of female schools. The designation of the following missionaries, who sailed from Boston on the 1st of May, 1834, is Mr. Garrett, Allen Graves, Sendai B. Munger, missionaries. George W. Hubbard and Amos Abbott, superintendents of schools. Mrs. Graves, Mrs. Munger, Mrs. Hubbard, Mrs. Abbott, Miss Orpah Graves, and Miss A. H. Kimball, teachers. The duties of the last-named person have been assigned to her. Mrs. A. Stone, wife of Mr. Stone, died of an affection of the liver, after 12 days' illness, August 7, 1833. During the year 1834, the gospel had been preached regularly in the chapel at Bombay, and also in the streets and public concourses. Mr. Stone has had interesting discussions with more than 100 Jews, who called on him to visit portions of the Scriptures. Mr. Ramsay devotes his time almost exclusively to preaching. A collection of Christian hymns, adapted to the native tunes, has been printed. Many of the natives are attracted to his public worship by the singing. The schools are 26 in number, 15 in Bombay, and 11 on the continent. The opposition to female education has been weak, but these schools are not yet in a satisfactory state. The total of printing in Marhatta has been 23,300 copies, and 1,411,900 pages. Since this mission was commenced, 28 persons have been gathered into the church of Christ.

The Bombay Religious Tract society, in its 4th and 5th years, received about 3394 papers, printed 3 new tracts, and issued 53,550 tracts. The native Education society have 317 boys in their schools.

The Scottish mission at Bombay was established in 1823. John Wilson, missionary. Two adults have been baptized. Much excitement has prevailed in consequence of Mr. Wilson's controversy with the Parsees. At the close of 1833 there were, in 16 schools, 1093 male and 176 female scholars, of whom 1075 were Hindus. The lithographic press has been removed hither from Horace. Before its removal, 7699 tracts were printed, and 370 since.

OSTOLE, a station of the B. M. S. eastward of Calcutta. C. C. Aratoon, missionary.

Enstollah has not been so much attended to as could be wished, in consequence of Mr. Aratoon's frequent indisposition, and his labors in Calcutta. One person has been baptized.

BOOTCHNAAP; a station of the Wesleyans among the Bechuanaas, S. South Africa, commenced in 1828. John Edwards, missionary. Dutch congregations, 300. Bechuanaa, 150. Members, 42. Scholars, 97. Last year there was an increase of 30 members; 5 died in the Lord.

BOUDINOTT; a station of the A. B. C. F. M. among the Osage Indians, 40 miles from Union. This latter place is on the Grand river, 25 miles N. of its entrance into the Arkansas, and 700 above the junction of the Arkansas and Mississippi. Rev. N. B. Dodge and Mrs. Dodge are missionaries at Boudinott. (See OSAGEA.)

BORABORA; one of the Society islands; it lies about 4 leagues N. W. of Taha. W. lon. 151° 52', N. lat. 16° 32'. It has one harbor for shipping. In its centre is a very lofty double-peaked mountain; its eastern side appears almost wholly barren, but the western part is more fertile; and a low border around the whole island, together with the islets in its reef, are productive and populous. The inhabitants were formerly noted for more daring ferocity than any of the neighboring islands, all of whom, at one time, they subjugated. This island renounced idolatry, with the rest of the Society islands, in the year 1816, and many of the natives were long very desirous that a missionary should settle among them. To meet their wishes, the Rev. Mr. Ormond, from the L. M. S., left Reiketa, on the 13th of November, 1820. The natives received him with much cordiality, and soon after commenced the building of a place of worship, and also of better habitations.

The mission in Borabora has been very severely tried. The war has greatly encouraged the profligate portion of the community, and painfully counteracted the labors of the missionaries. While Mr. Platt was absent, the extensive use of ardent spirits was revived, and followed by much intoxication and vice. The schools contained only 40 scholars, and it was not expected that 100 persons would remain in Christian fellowship.

BORNEO, next to New Holland, the largest island in the world, is about 800 miles long, and 700 broad, with a population estimated at from 3,000,000 to 5,000,000. Lon. 109° 2' to 119° E.; lat. 7° N. to 4° 20' S. Its central parts have never been explored by Europeans, and its insularity of its climate has prevented them from frequenting its shores. The island is often devastated by volcanoes and earthquakes. Though situated under the equator, the heat is not excessive, being moderated by the sea and mountain breezes, and by the rains, which are incessant from November till May. Diamonds are found in this country of great value. One of the native princes owns a diamond, worth about the sum of 1,200,000 dollars. Mohammedanism is the prevailing religion among the inhabitants of the coast, who are Malays, Javanese, &c. The Dinks are the most peculiar inhabitants, and the most numerous, covering the whole island of Borneo, with a considerable portion of the Celebes. Their manners are ferocious to the last degree. Procuring heads seems to be the great business and amusement of both chiefs and people. They are a finely formed race, and it is surprising to find among the visits of some men. Mr. Dalton, an Englishman, and it appears by the Singapore Chronicle, recently spent nearly two years on the island.

Borneo was about to be surveyed by Messrs. Lyman and Munson, of the A. B. C. F. M., who have been murdered.

BOSJESVELD; sometimes called Kramer's District, in the district of Tuluhah, about 40 miles from Cape Town.

In the late Messrs. Kramer, a Mohammedan, who greatly aided his assistance. Mr. Kramer, who is the only survivor of the first missionaries sent out to Africa in 1793, of which number was the late Dr. Vanderkemp, continues to labor to the present time with the same diligence and devotedness as have always characterized him. "The labors of our excellent missionary, Mr. Kramer," say the directors of the B. M. S. Society, "to the great glory of our Heavenly Father, do not admit of the same mode of reporting as is practicable with the rest of the society's stations. Dr. Philip states, that the favorable change which has been effected in Mr. Kramer's district is agreeably surprising. He preaches in all the neighboring villages and butts, with much acceptance."

BRAINERD, formerly Chickamaugh, in Chickamaugh district; a Cherokee nation, about 30 miles from the N. W. corner of Georgia, in an easterly direction, 2 miles within the chartered limits of Tennessee, on the western side of Chickamaugh creek, which is navigable to Brainerd, being 15 miles from its confluence with the Tennessee. It is nearly equidistant from the eastern and western extremities of the Cherokee country, and perhaps 25 or 30 miles from the northern limit, which is the mouth of the Hiwassee. It lies 250 miles N. W. of Augusta, Georgia, 150 miles S. E. of Nashville, 110 S. W. of Knoxville, Tennessee, about 2 miles N. E. of the road from Augusta to Nashville. W. lon. 86° N. lat. 35°.

The first mission of the A. B. C. F. M. among the Indians was commenced in this place, in January, 1817. A church was organized in September of the same year. Catharine Brown was the first fruit of missionary labor.

There are now at Brainerd, Samuel A. Warzester, missionary; John A. Taylor, teacher, and secular superintendent; John Fry, farmer; A. B. Enot, mechanic; Dr. E. Butler, physician; and their wives; Delight Sargent and Catharine Fuller, teachers. The mission is not flourishing, on account of political troubles.

BROOKA; the capital of the ancient Bithynia at the western base of mount Olympus, and for 1300 years the capital of the Turkish empire, and one of the most beautiful of cities. It has a large number of Moslem inhabitants, about 6000 Greeks, as many Armenians; 2 synagogues of Jews, and as many papists. Benjamin Schneider and wife, of A. B. C. F. M., have proceeded to this place to establish a mission.

BOUJAH; a village near Smyrna, Asia Minor, where all the English families of Smyrna generally reside in the hot season. Mr. Jetter, of the C. M. S., in the summer of 1831 established a girls' school at Boujah, which soon numbered between 60 and 70 children. There is a boys' school supported by the people, which is, in some measure, under Mr. Jetter's influence.

BRIDGETOWN; a sea-port and capital of the island Barbadoes, Lon. 59° 40' W. lat. 13° 5' N. Population, 15 or 20,000. It has suffered greatly by fire at three several times. Colonel Colington's college is in this town. A mission of the W. M. S. is established in this place.

BUDGE-BUDGE; a village near Calcutta, where is a catechist of the C. M. S.

BUENOS AYRES; an extensive country of South America, formerly belonging to Spain; but since the declaration of independence, in 1816, it has assumed the name of the United Provinces of South America. It is bounded N. by Bolivia, E. by Brazil, S. by Patagonia, S. E. by the Atlantic ocean, W. by Chili and the Pacific ocean. It comprehends most of the valley or basin of the great river La Plata.

Buenos Ayres, the city, is 66 leagues from the mouth of the La Plata; first built in the year 1535. Lon. 58° 31' W., lat. 34° 35' S. Population variously estimated at from 50,000 to 100,000. From 300 to 400 ships annually enter the port.

In October, 1825, Rev. Messrs. Parvin and Brigham, of the A. B. C. F. M., visited Buenos Ayres.

BUFFALO RIVER; a station of the L. M. S. among the Caffres, commenced in 1826. J. Brownlee, G. F. Kuyser, missionaries; Jan Tzatzoe, native assistant. Congregations, 100. From 600 to 1200 brought under the sound of the gospel. Communicants, 6. Scholars, 86. Sunday scholars, 63. Habits of industry are becoming more general.

BUFF-BAY; a station of the B. M. S. on the island Jamaica.

BULLION country, W. Africa, N. Sierra Leone colony.

The Bullions are a numerous people, extremely vindictive and superstitious, and very much addicted to witchcraft. Among them the tyranny and cruelty of satanical delusions are most affectingly displayed.

In every town are devil's houses to guard the place; and almost every Bullion house has some representation of Satan. Before the devil's houses, which are small thatched huts, 3 or 4 feet high, the blood of animals is sprinkled, a libation of palm wine poured out, and an offering of fruit and rice occasionally made. The Bullions believe in a state of existence after death, and erect huts over the graves of the dead, in which they place a jug or two to supply the spirits of the deceased with what they want when they come out, as they suppose they do, at different times.

In 1818, the Rev. Mr. Nylander, having resigned his situation as chaplain at Sierra Leone, for the purpose of commencing a missionary station among the Bullions, had fixed his residence at a place called Yonxroo Poonoh, which is described by the Rev. C. Bickersteth as "pleasantly situated at the mouth of the Sierra Leone river, nearly opposite to Free Town, and about 7 miles from it." Here he opened a school; and by the suavity of his manners, and the consistency of his conduct, so effectually conciliated the respect and esteem of the natives, that a considerable number of them were induced to place their children under his tuition. Even the king of Bullion trusted one of his sons to the care of this excellent missionary; but the young prince had not been long in the seminary before he died. "After he was dead," says Mr. Nylander, "the people were going to ask him, according to their custom, who had killed him; but I was very glad that, after long reasoning in opposition to their opinions, they were satisfied that he had not fallen a victim to the art of witch or gressee; but that God, who gave him life at first, had now called him home, to be with him, in a good and happy place; and I assured his friends, that if they would begin to pray to God they would once more meet him at that place, and rejoice with him forever. As I stated my belief that God had killed him, I was allowed to bury him, in 'white man's fashion,' and the king gave me a burying place separate from their own."

Among these victuals the Rev. Mr. Nylander continued to labor for a considerable time, with the most unvaried patience and unremitting zeal; and, in addition to the instruction of the children placed in his school, and the preaching of the truth, he translated the four gospels, the epistles of St. John, the morning and evening prayers of the church of England, some hymns, and several elementary books, into the Bullion language. In 1818, however, the pernicious influence the slave-trade rendered the prospect of success more dark and distant than ever, and the mission was consequently abandoned; Mr. Nylander retiring into the colony with the greater part of the pupils who, at that time, were under his instruction.

BUNTING; a station of the Wesleyans among the Anaponda Caffres, in Fiker's tribe; begun in 1830. W. Satchel, missionary. Congregations, 60 to 100. Members, 5. Candidates, 6. Scholars, from 200 to 300.

In 1821, the Rev. Mr. Bourne joined Mr. Darling, who had commenced a mission to the Ocapoos; the inhabitants of this district, and the station ultimately formed, assumed the above-mentioned name. Public religious services had been regularly kept up from the time of Mr. Darling's arrival. About 300 adults had been carefully examined, and 200 children had been baptized. Of the former, 21 were admitted to the Lord's supper, and the rest were under instruction as candidates for communion. Schools had also been established, both for adults and children. They contained at this time, of the former, 336; of the latter, 230. At another place, in the same district, there was a school, which contained about 80 chiefly adults. A large and commodious place of worship, in the English style, had been built, in the erection of which the natives cheerfully assisted. The natives were likewise, in some degree, inured to industry. Mrs. Bourne and Mrs. Darling had taught the females to make themselves bonnets of a species of grass adapted to this purpose. Scarcely a woman was to be seen in the congregation without a bonnet, or a man without a hat, of this simple manufacture. A printing establishment was formed here, and 5000 copies of the gospel by Matthew, and 3000 of that by John, in the Tahitian language, printed; which were received by the natives with the greatest avidity. Mr. Bourne having, soon after, removed from this station, Mr. Darling continued his zealous exertions, attended by the most encouraging success.

"The district in which this station is situated," says the report of 1831, "contains between 1000 and 1100 persons, who all attend the means of instruction and religious improvement. The congregation usually consists of between 800 and 900, and the station is prosperous. Order and harmony prevail. There has been a great diminution of crime and increase of industry. About 200 children regularly attend in the school, and many of the people are anxious to be furnished with books. The behavior of the chiefs and people is respectful and kind towards the missionary."

The average attendance at Burder's Point in 1833, was 1140. Communicants, 404. Scholars, 375. Public ordinances are a blessing to many, but the introduction of ardent spirits has caused manifold evils.

BURDWAN; a town of Hindostan, in Bengal, capital of a district which is the first in rank for agricultural riches in all India. It is seated near the Dumdooa, 68 miles N. W. of Calcutta. E. lon. 87° 57', N. lat. 23° 15'.

At the close of the year 1816, the corresponding committee at Calcutta, connected with the C. M. S., received a communication from lieutenant Stewart, stationed at Burdwan, proposing an extensive plan of native schools at and near that place. Three schools, in Burdwan, and at Lackoody, and Ryan, were accordingly taken under the society's care. With the concurrence of the committee, the plan was afterwards extended, and additional schools opened.

The Rev. Messrs. Jetter and Deerr were settled at Burdwan, on the 17th November, 1819; captain Stewart having purchased a piece of ground, and built a house for the accommodation of the missionary family. The former took charge of the central school recently erected, in which the English language was taught; and Mr. Deerr superintended the Bengalee schools.

In 1822, the Rev. J. Perowne and the Rev. W. Deerr (Rev. Mr. Jetter having suspended his labors at Burdwan from impaired health) were joined in the charge of the mission and schools by the Rev. Jacob Maish. In April, a church was nearly finished. Divine service was held twice on Sundays. The first converts in this mission were baptized on the 5th of May.

In 1823, the work appears to have increased and prospered. Two more adult youths were added to the church; and the blessing of God manifestly rendered his religion more generally afforded to the elder youths. To the schools on the western side of the town, under the more particular care of Messrs. Deerr and Maish, Mr. Perowne added two on the eastern; one containing 80 boys, and the other about 100.

In 1825, Burdwan was deprived of two valuable missionaries. The death of Mr. Maish took place Aug. 29; and Mrs. Maish's continued ill health rendered her unable to continue her labors.

BURMAH, or BURMAN EMPIRE. (See BIRMA, MAHLMEIN, and TAVOY.)

BURRISHOL; capital of the Backereunj district, 72 miles S. of Dacca, and 140 miles E. of Serampore. Rev. John Smith is laboring in this place. Mr. Smith studied nearly five years at Serampore. A liberal fund for Burrishol has given 1,340 rupees, the interest of which is to be appropriated to the support of a mission and school in this place. Mr. Smith entered on his work in the beginning of 1830.

In 1833, the native communicants at Burrishol were 7. Inquirers, 5. In 7 schools there are 231 boys. Much good is done by visiting the weekly markets in the neighborhood.

BUTTERWORTH; a station of the W. M. S. among the Caffres, in South Africa; a town in Wesleyville, in Hintza's tribe. Established in 1827. John Ayliff, missionary. Congregations on Sundays, 200; members, 16. A few persons are candidates for baptism. Mr. Shrewsbury thus speaks of the station: "The situation could not be more favorable. Butterworth stands in the very centre of the tribe. So many kraals have been built near us, that we are quite surrounded; and have in our vicinity, and within the reach of our Sabbath labors, almost double the population which we found at the commencement of the mission. Our chief is not a converted man, but it is his sincere desire never to fight another battle with any people." Butterworth is the centre of the missions which are nearest the colony, and on the thoroughfare to distant stations.

Members at Butterworth, 17. Scholars, 36. Considerable religious attention was experienced in 1833; 11 couple were married.

BUXAR; a town in Bahar, Hindostan, situated in a healthy, pleasant plain, on the S. side of the Ganges, about 70 miles below Benares, and about 400 N. W. of Calcutta, in the midst of a very numerous heathen population. Here are about 90 European invalids, and nearly that number of native Christian women. Less than half a mile from the town is a place where numerous devotees, from different parts of India, take up their residence, mostly for life. Two grand fairs are annually held, which greatly increase its importance as a missionary station.

A native Christian, Kurrun Mesech, from Chunar, commenced his labors in this place in 1820, under the direction of the C. M. S. He was very useful in teaching the native Christians to read the New Testament, and to repeat the catechism, as well as in leading their worship, according to the Hindostanee prayer-book. About 40 received instruction at this time, in various ways, and he has continued his efforts with some success.

John Macleod is now a catechist at Buxar. Services in English and Hindostanee held on Sundays. In 5 schools are nearly 200 boys.

CAPFRARIA commences at the Great Fish river, South Africa, which divides it from Albany in the colony, and runs along the Indian ocean, in a N. E. direction, to the river Bassee, which divides it from the Tamboukie country. It does not extend more than 70 miles up the country, or to the W., at least at the S. end of it, being separated from the colony and Bushman country on that side by a chain of mountains. It abounds with mountains, woods, and water, and is far more populous than either the Bushman, Coranna, or Namagoo countries. The people also are taller, more robust, and more industrious. "Better-shaped men," says Mr. Campbell, "I never saw." They are a warlike race, and many of them are greatly addicted to plundering. Like the Chinese, they consider all other people inferior to themselves, and suppose that Europeans wear clothes merely on account of having feeble and sickly bodies. They have scarcely any religion; but some of them profess to believe that some great being came from above and made the world, after which he returned, and cared no more about it. It is very probable, that even this feeble ray of light was obtained by means of their intercourse with the Dutch bores during several ages. They consider man as on a level with the brutes, with regard to the duration of his life; so that when he is dead, there is an end of his existence. Like the Matchappes, they have circumcision among them, though ignorant of what gave rise to the custom. They perform this ceremony on their young men at the age of 14 years, or more. Polygamy is very general among them. The common people have eidym more than one or two wives, but their chiefs generally four or five. When a Caffre is sick, they generally send for a person who is considered a physician, who pretends to extract from the body of the sick serpents, stones, bones, &c. At other times he beats them on the elbow, knees, and ends of their fingers, till, as the Hottentots express it, these are almost rotten; they sometimes, also, kill cattle in the way of sacrifice for the person; and at others the doctor pretends to drive out the devil, and to kill him. The Caffres have a barbarous custom of exposing their sick friends who, in their opinion, are not likely to recover. They bury none but their chiefs and their wives; others are thrown out to be devoured by the wild beasts. Should a person die accidentally in his own house, the whole kraal is deserted. Many of them are very hospitable to strangers; not waiting till they ask for victuals, but bringing it of their own accord, and setting it before them, and always of the best they have. The riches of a Caffre chiefly consist of his cattle, of which he is extravagantly fond. He keeps them as carefully as the miser does his gold. He does not use them as beasts of burden, except when he is removing from one place to another along with his kraal, and then they carry the milk bags, or skin bags which contain milk. He is never more gratified than when running before them with his shield, by beating on which the whole are taught to gallop after him. In this way he sends them out to take exercise, and the Caffres who are quickest on such occasions are considered his best; of these he boasts, and treats them with peculiar kindness. The Caffres chiefly subsist upon milk; but in part, also, by hunting, and by the produce of their gardens. They sow a species of millet, which is known in the colony by the name of Caffre corn. While growing, it very much resembles Indian corn, only the fruit grows in clusters, like the grapes; the grain is small and round, and when boiled it is very palatable. They generally sow it between two stoozes, and make a kind of bread from it. To sow it is the work of the women. They scatter the seed on the grass, after which they push off the grass from the surface, by means of a kind of wooden spade, shaped something like a spoon at both ends, by which operation the seed falls upon the ground, and is covered by the grass; but underneath which withered and rotten grass, it afterwards springs up. They also sow the pumpkin, water-melons, and other various vegetables, which grow wild. They cultivate tobacco, and smoke it, like the Matchappes, through water in a horn. The men spend their days in idleness, leaving no employment but war, hunting, and milking the cows. The women construct inclosures for the cattle, utensils, and clothes; they also till the ground and cut wool. They likewise manufacture mats of rushes, and neat baskets, wrought so close as to contain milk, but which are seldom used. Their dwellings, except for the dogs' houses, they, moreover, build houses in the shape of a cone, formed of long sticks bent into that shape, thatched with straw, and plastered in the inside with a mixture of clay and cow-dung; the entrance is low, seldom higher than two or three feet; and having no chimney, the smoke proceeding from the fire, which is placed in the middle of the hut, must find its passage out the best way it can, through the roof or by the door. As respects to these people, there is another numerous tribe, called Tambookies; and further to the N. E., near Delagoa bay, are the Mambookies, who are very numerous. These are said to be of the Caffre race, as are the numerous tribes of the Boottuanas to the W.

Dr. Vanderkemp, with other agents of the L. M. S., attempted an establishment on the Keiskamma river, in 1799; but owing to the disturbed state of the country, and the prejudices of the people, they were removed to Great River, within the Colony, in 1801; not, however, till they had evangelized many of the Caffres, and prepared the way for future labors.

The Rev. Josiah Williams, accompanied by his wife, Mr. Keal, and a native convert, Tzatoze, arrived at a place intended for a station, near Cat river, in 1816. The chiefs of this country welcomed them with the greatest kindness.

Mr. Williams, at a house, formed a garden, inclosed ground for corn, and prepared for conducting water to it from a distance. About 100 Caffres attended his ministry on the Sabbath, and about 70 on other days. A school he commenced containing about 150 native children. But in the midst of his efforts, Mr. Williams was called, on the 24th of August, 1813, to his reward. Obstacles afterwards arose, partly from the existence of a Caffre war, which prevented, for a time, the establishment of the mission.

In 1825, the Rev. John Brownlee, who had been successfully engaged at Chumbe, at the expense of the colonial government, agreed to attempt its revival. Accompanied by Jan Tzatoze, who, since the death of Mr. Williams, had been a teacher at Theopolis, he proceeded to Tzatoze's kraal, on the Buffalo river, the residence of his assistant's father, who is a Caffre chief of considerable influence.

The Rev. Frederick Schreyer, from the university at Halle, had recently been appointed, in consequence of these circumstances, a missionary of the society to Caffraria.

John Brownlee and G. F. Kayser continue at this station, assisted by Jan Tzatoze. Mr. Kayser, who has made good progress in the language, itinerates among the people.

The Rev. William Shaw, accompanied by other members of the H. M. S., travelled through a considerable part of this country in 1823, and thence northward, to take possession of a place for a mission, which lay between the residence of two chiefs.

For accounts of these missions, see TZATZOE'S KRAAL; COKE'S MOUNT; WESLEYVILLE; CHEMIE, &c.

CAIRO; the capital city of Egypt, and one of the largest cities in the world. It lies on the east bank of the Nile, in a sandy plain, and contains Old Cairo, Boulak (the harbor), and New Cairo. The city itself is 31-1/2 leagues in circuit, has 31 gates, 2400 irregular unpaved streets, which, during the night, are closed; 25,840 houses, and more than 200,000 inhabitants. There are 18 public baths, 300 mosques, 2 Greek, 12 Coptic, and 1 Armenian church, and 36 synagogues. Here is a Mohammedan high school, a printing office, and library of 25,000 volumes. In the summer and autumn of 1831, the cholera raged with fatal violence at Cairo. For a few days, 1500 individuals were carried off every day. The C. M. S. employ in Egypt W. Kruse, T. R. Lielier, T. Mueller, missionaries. Scholars in 2 schools in Cairo, 50, with 20 girls in a female school.

CAICUTTA; a city of Hindostan, the emporium of Bengal, the seat of the supreme government of British India, and the see of a bishop, with a cathedral called Fort William. It is situated on the left bank of the Hoogly, or western arm of the Ganges, 100 miles from its mouth, and extends from the W. point of fort William, up the river, about 6 miles; the breadth, in many parts, is inconsiderable. Generally speaking, the description of one Indian city is a description of all; being all built on one plain, with very narrow and crooked streets, interspersed with numerous reservoirs, ponds, and gardens. A few of the streets are paved with brick. The houses are variously built; some with brick, others with mud, and a greater proportion with bamboo and mats; these different kinds of fabrics, intermixed with each other, form a motley appearance. Those of the latter kinds are invariably of one story, and covered with thatch; those of brick seldom exceed two floors, and have thatch which is so thinly scattered, that, if these, which often happen, do not, sometimes, meet with the obstruction of a brick house through the whole street. But Calcutta is, in part, an exception to this rule of building; for the quarter inhabited by the English is composed entirely of brick buildings, many of which have the appearance of palaces.

The population of Calcutta is probably about 500,000. An equal number is contained in the suburbs. The population of the surrounding districts, within a space of 20 miles, is estimated at 2,225,000. Here is the residence of the governor-general of India, and the seat of the supreme court of justice, which decides causes according to the English Law, without regard to country, rank, or office. Calcutta is the great emporium of Bengal, and the channel through which the treasures of the interior provinces are conveyed to Europe. The port is filled with ships of all nations, and there are some 2000 houses which trade annually to the amount of 4 or 5,000,000 pounds.

In 1756, Calcutta was taken by the soubah of Bengal, who forced the feeble garrison of the old fort, to the amount of 146 persons, into a small prison called the Black Hole, out of which only 23 came alive the next morning. It was retaken the next year; the victory of Plassey followed; and the inhuman soubah was deposed, and put to death by his successor. The year after this, the English Government obtained possession of Fort William commenced, which is superior in regularity and strength to any fort in India, is supposed to have cost about 2,000,000 pounds sterling, and is capable of containing 15,000 men. No ship can pass without being exposed to the fire of the fort, nor can an enemy approach by land without being discerned at the distance of 10 or 12 miles.

Sir William Jones instituted here, in 1784, the Asiatic S., designed to concentrate all attainable knowledge of the eastern part of the present India. The "Asiatic Researches" are the productions of this society, forming a noble and splendid monument of British science in a distant country.

In 1800, the college at Fort William was founded by the marquis Wellesley, to initiate the English youth, who were to fill the different departments of government, into the languages of the country, and also to concentrate all attainable knowledge of the eastern part of the present India. The "Asiatic Researches" are the productions of this society, forming a noble and splendid monument of British science in a distant country.

The "Asiatic Researches" are the productions of this society, forming a noble and splendid monument of British science in a distant country.

In 1816, a Hindoo college was founded. This institution is remarkable as being the first which has been projected, superintended, and supported by the natives, for the instruction of their sons in the English and Indian languages, and in the literature and science of Europe and Asia.

A large sum having been placed by the Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts at the disposal of the Rev. Dr. Middleton, while bishop of Calcutta, he established Bishop's college. The objects of this institution are:—1. To prepare native and other Christian youths to become preachers, catechists, and schoolmasters; 2. To teach the elements of useful knowledge and the English language to Mussulmans and Hindoos; 3. To translate the Scriptures, the liturgy, and tracts; 4. To receive English missionaries, sent out by the society, on their first arrival in India.

At an examination at the Hindoo college, on the 20th of March, 1833, essays were read on several historical subjects, and questions put by the bishop and other gentlemen. The most sanguine expectations of the visitors were exceeded.

The supreme government was induced, in consequence of the late bishop Heber's known wishes on the subject, to make a large and extremely important addition to the land already granted to the college.

The following facts will show the present condition of the college:—The Rev. John Zuck Kiermeyer, from the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, was the honored instrument of establishing the first Protestant mission in Bengal. After laboring many years at Cuddalore, he came to Calcutta, in 1716; where he erected a place of worship, and served a church, which was the prototype and one in Bengal for about 30 years. About 1773, the communicants were 173, of whom 104 were natives. In the two succeeding years 39 were added, mostly Hindoos. Amidst numerous discouragements, he continued to witness many precious fruits of his labors, till 1787; when Mr. Grant purchased the house for 5000 dollars, called it the Missionary Church, and devoted it to its original design. About this time, the Rev. David Brown, some years first chaplain of the presidency and provost of the college at Fort William, among other zealous efforts for the promotion of Christianity in India, devoted much of his time to the spiritual good of this flock, till about 1811; when the Rev. T. T. Thomson took the charge, and continued to preach for many years in the mission church, to a large and respectable congregation, which raised a fund for his support.

When the Evangel. M. S. was deliberating on its first efforts, the committee learned that Mr. John Thomas, who had been several years in Bengal, preaching the gospel to the natives, was then in London, endeavoring to establish a fund for a mission to that country, and that he was desirous of engaging a companion to return with him to the work. On particular inquiry, it appeared that Mr. Thomas, after hav-log embraced the gospel, under the ministry of Dr. Stenact, went out, in the year 1783, as surgeon of the Oxford East Indianman; that while he was in Bengal he felt a desire to communicate the gospel to the natives; and being encouraged to do so by a religious friend, he obtained his discharge from the ship; and after learning the language, continued from the year 1787 to 1791, preaching the gospel in different parts of the country. Early in the following year, Mr. Carey accepted an invitation to take charge of an Indian factory at Madnasabaty, 200 miles N. of Calcutta, and Mr. Thomas acceded to a similar appointment at Moypauldingy, 16 miles further N. Here their means were ample; and at the same time they had charge of several hundred Hindoos, to whom they gave instruction, besides preaching to the natives, both at their places of residence and in preaching circuits.

Mr. Carey's appointment, in 1801, to an important station in the new village at Fort William, prepared the way for the establishment of a mission in this city. In January, 1803, a place of worship was opened; a few only attended, perhaps 20. More attention was shortly afterwards awakened. A shed was taken in Lal Bazar, in which large congregations assembled; and in January, 1809, a new chapel was opened. In a few weeks from that time, 6 persons were baptized; others were inquiring the way of salvation; and 2 native missionaries were sent out.

On January 11th, 1816, the Rev. Messrs. John Lawson and Eustace Carey were ordained co-pastors of the church at Calcutta, in connection with the senior brethren.

A new chapel was opened for English worship in 1821; the expense, about 3700 pounds, was defrayed by subscriptions on the spot. A chapel was also erected at the charge of a pious female servant.

In 1821, Mr. Kirkpatrick, a young man, had discovered such aptitude and inclination to the work, that he was adopted as a missionary.

The state of the mission is thus described in the last report:

W. Yates, W. H. Pearce, George Pearce, James Thomas, C. C. Arnot, and J. D. Ellis are now connected with the station. Mr. Kirkpatrick has joined the Wesleyan mission, and Mr. Penney is on a visit home. Communicants, more than 50. A new place of worship has been erected, at a cost of more than 460 pounds. A new school for English and Bengalee contains 60 boys. Girls' central school, 103. The press has been kept in constant activity. Nearly all the chapels are well attended. Powerful impressions have been produced on the minds of many.

The Benevolent Institution, conducted by Mr. Penney, continues to be a source of much benefit to the indigent youth of Calcutta. The present number of pupils is 211; among whom are to be found Europeans, Haidoos, Mussulmans, Portuguese, Indo-Britons, Chinese, Africans, Armenians, and Jews. Since the establishment of this institution, more than 2000 children have been fostered under its benevolent wing, who would otherwise, in all probability, have been doomed to a life of ignorance, wretchedness, and vice.

The improvement of the scholars is considered to be equal to that of any school in England. More than 100 of the present members can read the Scriptures. A great loss was experienced in the death of Mrs. Penney, which took place December 24, 1829.

The printing office, conducted by Mr. W. H. Pearce, is becoming more and more important as a means of diffusing intellectual, moral, and religious truth. Besides many tracts and school-books, in various languages, and other miscellaneous works of a larger size, there have issued from it a Commentary on the Romans, in Bengalee, by brother Eustace Carey; a work on Geography, with other small publications, in the same language, by brother Pearce; with a Harmony of the Gospels, in Hindostanee, a new translation of the Psalms, and an epitome of Natural History, with various other works, in Bengalee, by brother Yates. About 70 persons are employed in various capacities in the office, of whom are several native Christians, the comfort of whom is supported by their own labor.

A corresponding committee, in connexion with the C. M. S., was formed at Calcutta in 1815, to which the affairs of that institution in the N. of India were intrusted: 1500 pounds per annum were allowed to them by the society, and the European residents added to this sum several hundred pounds.

On the 5th of June, 1816, the Rev. Mr. and Mrs. Greenwood, and Mr. Schroeter, arrived, and were gladly received by the society's friends, who had long been waiting their coming. They were placed, pro tempore, in a house just purchased at Garden Reach, about a mile below the city, where they were diligently employed in learning Bengalee.

At Kidderpore, a village near Garden Reach, a native having given ground for the purpose, a school-room was erected, and a teacher was appointed to carry it into effect the new system of instruction. On the 12th of October, 1817, after the first discourse had been delivered, professionally with a missionary object, from a pulpit of the established church in India, (which produced about 300 pounds,) a native from Bareilly was baptized, by the name of Fuz Messach, who had been a year under instruction, and had given satisfactory evidence of his sincerity.

The natives who gave the ground for the erection of the school at Kidderpore, wished that those boys who should become most proficient in Bengalee should be taught English. This was attended to, and between 20 and 30 boys received instruction. Of the state of the school Mr. G. reports very favorably, under date of November 5, 1817. In consequence of a particular necessity for his services, he soon afterwards proceeded to Cunar, and the Rev. Deocar and Mrs. Schmid were appointed to the station.

About this time the B. & F. S. S., in concert with some members of the Calcutta S. S., then in England, had obtained funds for sending out a suitable female teacher to India. Such a person was found in Miss Cooke, whose services, on her arrival in India, were surrendered by her first supporters to the corresponding committee, who were extremely desirous of promoting female education. The commencement of her exertions was singularly interesting. While engaged in study of the Bengalee language, and scarcely daring to hope that an immediate opening for entering upon the work to which she had devoted herself would be found, Miss Cooke paid a visit to one of the society's boys' schools, in order to observe their pronunciation. This circumstance, trifling in appearance, led to the establishment of her first school. Unaccustomed to see an European female in that part of the native town, a crowd collected round the door of the school. Among them was an interesting looking little girl, whom the school punisher drove away. Miss Cooke desired the child to be called, and, by an interpreter, asked her if she wished to learn to read? She was told, in reply, that this child had, for 3 months past, been daily begging to be admitted to learn to read among the boys; and that if Miss Cooke (who had made known her purpose of devoting herself to the instruction of girls) would attend next day, 20 girls should be collected.

On the following day, Miss Cooke, accompanied by a female friend, who speaks Bengalee fluently, attended accordingly. About 15 girls, accompanied, in several cases, by their mothers, assembled; and the following few particulars of a long conversation which took place with them will afford some insight into the modes of thinking prevalent among them. On their inquiring Miss Cooke's circumstances, they were told that she had heard in England that the women of this country were kept in total ignorance; that they were not taught even to read knowledge; and it was also generally understood, that the chief objection to their acquiring knowledge arose from their having no females who would undertake to teach them. She had, therefore, felt compassion for their state, and had determined to leave her country, parents, friends, and every other advantage, and to come here for the sole purpose of educating their female children. They, with one voice, cried out, amidst the bosoms which she had to call, and, by an interpreter, asked her if she would, if she would, "She has given up every earthly expectation to come here; and seeks not the riches of this world, but to promote your best interests." "Our children are yours; we give them to you," replied two or three of their mothers at once. After a while, one asked, "What will be the use of learning to our female children? and what advantage will it be to them?" She was told, that "it will enable them to read the Scriptures, and will enable them to gain them respect, and increase the harmony of families." "True," said one of them, "our husbands now look upon us as little better than brutes." And another added, "What benefit will you derive from this work?" She was told that the only return we wished, was to promote their best interests and happiness. Then, "said the woman, I suppose this is a holy work in your sight, and we will consent to God." As they were not yet settled in their quarters, it was only said in return, that "God is always well pleased that we should love and do good to our fellow-creatures." The women then spoke to one another in terms of the highest approbation.

This development of Miss Cooke's plans seems to have prevented much suspicion from being entertained as to her motives, and the effects of her intercourse with the children. Permitted to remain resident from time to time, from eight to a quarter of the native town; so that her schools were soon established, and more might have been begun, had time allowed.

On the 28th of August, 1823, an auxiliary M. S. was formed, and 3000 rupees contributed; and a Ladies' S. for the promotion of female education was subsequently established, under the patronage of Lady Anherst. The total number of publications reported the following year, as issued from the society's press, was 25,200.

Among the losses which the cause of religion has sustained in India, it is impossible to overlook that which has been occasioned by the departure of the tried and zealous friend of the society—the Rev. T. T. Thomaon.

The Rev. John Theophilus Reichardt, and Mrs. Reichardt, with the Rev. Isaac Wilson, are more immediately connected with the direct objects of the mission; while Mrs. Wilson (late Miss Cooke) attends to most of the female school department; and the Rev. Deocar Schmid and Mrs. Schmid have the superintendance of the female orphan asylum. The committee having been unable to send out a suitable person to succeed Mr. Brown as a printer, Mr. Reichardt, who conducts that department in addition to his other duties, is at present assisted by Mr. de Rozario.

Mrs. Wilson, assisted by Miss Ward, continues to prosecute her important work with her accustomed good sense and vigor. In July, 1833, there were more than 700 children in the various schools connected with the society; all receiving instruction on Christian principles suited to their years.

In the year 1798, the Rev. Mr. Forsyth was sent to Calcutta, under the patronage of the L. M. S. He preached for several years every Sunday at Chittisurah, where he resided, and also at Calcutta, where he had the use of a large chapel open to all denominations of Christians.

The Rev. Messrs. Townly and Keith arrived at Calcutta in September, 1816, and at an early period began to preach, in Bengalee, the gospel of God.

In 1817, a School Book S. was established, principally for the supply of native schools; and was also the Calcutta School S., the design of which is to improve existing schools, and to establish and support any further schools and seminaries which may be requisite; with a view to a more general diffusion of knowledge among the inhabitants of India, of every description, especially within the provinces subject to the presidency of Fort William.

The erection of a spacious and commodious chapel, to be called Union Chapel, was contemplated in 1815, towards which the sum of 14,000 sicca rupees (about 1750 pounds sterling) had been subscribed; exclusive of which the sum of 2200 sicca rupees (or 275 pounds) had been contributed in support of public worship.

The Rev. Messrs. Hampson and Travin arrived, with their wives, at Calcutta, February 8th, 1819; but a few months after, Mrs. H. was removed by death.

On the 21st of September, 1820, the mission sustained a heavy loss, by the death of Mr. Hampson.

A printing-press was established in connexion with the mission at this station; and was placed under the more immediate superintendance of the Bengal A. S.

The Rev. Messrs. James Hill, Micaiah Hill, and J. B. Warden, arrived, with their wives, at Calcutta March 5th, 1822. Mr. Travin shortly after removed to Kidderpore with his family.

An institution called the Christian School S. was also formed at Calcutta, the object of which is to introduce Christian instruction into the indigenous, or native, schools, under the entire management of native schoolmasters.

A Bethel S. was established at Calcutta, in connexion with the Baptist brethren who reside at Serampore and Calcutta, in the same year; as was also an auxiliary B. A.

In 1823 and 1824, success accompanied the various efforts of the missionaries.

On the 8th January, 1826, Mr. Warden departed this life. It being his earnest desire that Mrs. Warden might, after his decease, continue in India, and exert herself in promoting native female education, she removed, shortly after the melancholy event, to Berhampore, to assist Mrs. Micaiah Hill. Mr. Ray, who had, soon after his return to India, joined Mr. Micaiah Hill, settled at Calcutta.

The inhabitants of this region are fishermen and salt-makers. They have received the gospel with apparent thankfulness, and the missionaries, who occasionally visit them, hope to be gladdened by beholding the fruit of their labors.

Messrs. Gogery and Adam, assisted by a native preacher, Narapat Sing, have continued the public services in the native church, and in the chapel at Tontonea, Hautkolah, and Mirzapore. The congregation at Tontonea, though variable, is generally large. That at Hautkolah is increasing, both in number and interest. Mr. Adam has almost daily itinerated in the suburbs of Calcutta, distributing tracts and conversing with the heathen. The number of members in the native church, is 24. Mr. James Hill continues to discharge the pastoral duties connected with Union chapel, with commendable zeal, and much to the satisfaction of his hearers. In fort William, through the kindness of several persons high in authority, a place has been appropriated to divine worship, where the missionaries hold two religious services every week, with a very orderly and attentive assembly of soldiers. A blessing has accompanied these labors, and a Christian society has been formed among them. The missionaries have several native schools in Calcutta.

Of the L. M. S. at Calcutta, James Hill, G. Gogery, and John Campbell are the missionaries. Narapat Sing, native preacher. Mr. Christie has joined the South African mission. Native services are held twice on Sundays, and 5 times on week days. Communicants, 34, of whom we were added the year. 100 schools, 1000 scholars. 1000 tracts were distributed on one occasion, in the outstations. At 9 schools there are 550 scholars.

The church of Scotland established a mission in Calcutta in 1830. Alexander Duff, missionary. Sinclair Mackay, second master. Mr. Duff delivers lectures on Christianity to such Hindus, especially the young and well educated, as may be inclined to attend. He has baptised several, some of them converts of the Hindoo college. His character and proceedings have given him much influence with intelligent natives.

PRESENT STATE OF CALCUTTA.

In reviewing the efforts which are now made for the intellectual and spiritual benefit of Calcutta, we were very much struck with the diversity of the measures which are in operation. First comes the preaching of the gospel. In all more than thirty European ministers and missionaries are now preaching the gospel in Calcutta. One of these ministers, Rev. W. H. Pearce, in a letter, bearing date January 14, 1832, and directed to a friend in this country, says: "I have lately returned from a missionary excursion of about a fortnight. You will be gratified to hear that, during our trip, my associate and myself met with the pleasure of receiving 8 heathen converts into the church of Christ. And our Pedobaptist brethren have lately had an accession of twice that number."

Tens of thousands in Calcutta and its neighborhood now hear the words of eternal life from the lips of the living preacher. In one of the suburbs, more than 100 persons have lately embraced the profession of Christianity, and regularly attend the ordinances of the gospel. There are now in circulation in Calcutta, 35,000 copies of tracts were about to be prepared by the Christian Book and Tract society; consisting of 16,000 copies of one new and two reprinted Bengalee tracts, and of 19,000 copies of 3 new tracts and 3 reprinted in Hindostanee. The parent society has granted 116 reams of paper and 15,000 English publications; the state of its bound works continues to be encouraging, and fresh supplies have been required. The Book of Common Prayer has been translated into Hindostanee, Persian, and Malayalam. There are now 7 hymnals in Hindostanee, 4 in Armenian, and 1 in Tamul. A considerable degree of excitement, chiefly by tracts, has lately been awakened among the Mohammedans. They assemble in much greater numbers, and evince a more eager desire than formerly to hear remarks, to answer questions, and refute arguments used in defence of Christianity.

There are now in circulation in Calcutta, 15,000 copies of the Scriptures, or portions of the Scriptures, were put into circulation in the year 1830. "The missionaries," says Mr. Deultry, "are constantly calling for the Scriptures in all the dialects of the presidency. Mr. Bowley, at the different fairs, distributes great numbers of books and tracts; the natives are eager to obtain them. The state of things is, indeed, quite anomalous. In Calcutta, there are thousands of youths receiving Christian education, and who can give a better account of the Christian faith and duty than many English boys of the same age, and yet retain all their heathen prejudices and practices. Converts who seldom hear of, but the natives flock on all hands to receive Christian instruction. We cannot doubt, however, that this is preparing the way of the Lord." The standing and authorized version of the Scriptures in Bengalee is proceeding under a sub-committee specially appointed for the purpose, and consisting of the best scholars in the presidency, it being of the utmost importance that there should be a version of the blessed book which may be depended upon for accuracy and elegance of expression.

EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTIONS. The "Benevolent Institution," before mentioned, offers an asylum to children bearing the Christian name, but utterly destitute and wandering in the streets and lanes of the city. The great majority of 1,200, or 1,500 children and youth, have conducted themselves highly to the satisfaction of their employers, after having gone out into various families. A steady and consistent piety has appeared in some of the scholars. The daily attendance in the central and 2 subordinate schools, under the care of the "Ladies' Native Female Education Society," varies from 240 to 330; of these girls, 186 read the Scriptures, or the Bible History. The Wesleyan missionaries have schools, with about 200 children. In order to raise the "Calcutta Hig Schools" to a more permanent and commanding rank, a sum of money is collecting by transferrable shares of 250 rupees each, to be applied exclusively to the department of education; and subscriptions are also making for the erection of the proper buildings. On the 23d of June, 1830, 24,000 rupees had been collected in India, and a gentleman in England had given 30,000 rupees. Of the "Bishop's College" we have spoken before.

NEWS PAPERS AND LITERATURE AT CALCUTTA. It is long since the importance of a weekly publication, or newspaper, for the benefit of the natives of Bengal, was felt as being calculated to rectify and enlarge their ideas respecting a thousand subjects. This paper, entitled the "SUMACHIA DURPUN," now pays itself, and is read with the greatest avidity. The first number appeared on the 23d of May, 1818. Coming week after week for so many years, the light which it has diffused cannot be considerable. Some time ago, the editor commenced printing it in parallel columns of Bengalee and English; and, in January, 1830, changed the shape into 8 pages of the usual size of our papers, instead of 4; the NATIVE subscribers having expressed a wish that they might be able to bind it up at the end of the year, and preserve it for the instruction of their CHILDREN. It is now sent to at least 40 different country places; going as far as Chittagong on the E., and even to Assam on the N. O. to Benares, 460 miles, and to Delhi, 960 miles N. W. The advantage which the natives of the country have derived from it in learning English is very great, since the English original and the Bengalee translation are placed so near to each other that the meaning of each word is obtained without the slightest difficulty. Besides the "Durpun," there are now not fewer than 46 Bengalee papers in Calcutta, besides 2 Persian, edited by natives; 7 weekly; and 1 twice a week. Several of these contain intelligence respecting the governor-general in council, the supreme courts, the police, intelligence from Britain, and other European countries. In May, 1825, the subscribers to the 6 papers were calculated at from 800 to 1000, and 5 readers to each paper. During the year 1830, the number of subscribers to native newspapers doubled. "When this paper," says the Durpun, "was first published, 12 years ago, we were censured by many of our subscribers for inserting intelligence respecting countries of which they knew not even the name; but we perceive, with much pleasure, that the papers in Calcutta, conducted exclusively by natives, have now begun to introduce intelligence from all parts of the world. The first Bengalee work issued by the native printing press was published 7 years ago, and called the "Uttar Mongul." In one year (1830) no less than thirty-seven books and tracts appeared. Thus the Hindoos themselves are actively engaged in hastening Hindooism in its progress to the grave; for the more it is exposed, the sooner will it fall into deserved oblivion. A new weekly periodical has started, called the "Book of Light," giving the true meaning of the Vedangas, Poojans, &c., so that every thing relating to the shasters, translated into Bengalee, will be open to the comprehension of all. Whatever doth make manifest is light; and the effect of this publication will unconsciously be the exposure of the perplexity and confusion, the darkness and cruelty of the whole system.

There is now a Calcutta Journal and a Literary Gazette, supported by native writers; and among 14 publications, printed by natives in English, during the last year, it is curious to observe, "Remarks on the Luxury of the Irish Poor during the Season of Harvest," &c. The "Early Life of Lord Liverpool," "Self-Guide to the Knowledge of the English Language, in Bengalee and English," &c.

Native efforts, however, begin to take a much higher range than any thing yet mentioned. In 1811, a complete edition of the "Shah Nameh" was undertaken by Dr. Lumsden for government, to be completed in 8 volumes. This is the great historic poem of the Persians, so highly esteemed by William Jones, and which is considered as the highest specimen of the Persian tongue. It was abandoned, as being too expensive, after the first volume was printed. On the 27th of February, 1830, the Durpun mentions that an edition has just been completed by captain Mahom. It consists of 110,408 lines; and the editor has collated the work with 17 editions; this implies the reading and weighing of upwards of 2,000,000 lines, at 500 a day for ten years. This great work has been printed at the expense of the king of Oude. The progress made by the natives in the acquisition of English during the last 12 years is truly astonishing. It would be easy to point out a great number of native young gentlemen who have acquired a most thorough knowledge of English. A native has advertised a volume of English poetry, composed by himself.

The numerous and growing sensible works which may fill the vacant hours of the Hindu students, and which may impart correct notions of literature and science and religion, is great beyond estimation. Most disastrous would it be if the schemes of education now on foot should serve only to create readers for idolatrous publications, from a lack of more useful works.

The cause of Christianity in Calcutta, as well as throughout India, has undergone a severe trial from the death of bishop Turner. He was the fourth prelate of the English church, who went down to the grave after a short period of labor. Great and successful efforts were made by the friends of India to procure a division of the diocese at the time of the renewal of the East India company's charter, in 1833. The appointment of the Rev. Daniel Wilson, of Islington, to the vacated see, is a fact of great interest, and is an auspicious omen of good to India, as it shows the feelings of those in whom the appointing power is vested. A grievous injustice, which has long been manifested by the East India government to its native subjects in refusing to employ them in the public service on their embracing Christianity, has at length been put away. The extinguishment of the suttee fires, or widow-burning, is also a most gratifying fact.

The standing and authorized version of the Scriptures, written in 1832, are still more applicable now. Bishop Wilson has entered on his course under very happy auspices, and all the great interests of education and Christianity in Calcutta are in a condition of gratifying advancement.

CALDWELL; an agricultural town in the colony of Liberia, N. of Monrovia and S. of Millsburg, on the S. side of St. Paul's river. It has its name from Elias B. Caldwell, one of the earliest and most efficient friends of the American Colonization society. More and more attention is paid to agriculture; 3 schools are established.

CALEDON; a Hottentot village in South Africa, about 120 miles E. Cape Town; formerly called Zuurbrack, from the valley in which it is situated. In 1822, the population was estimated at about 1100.

The Rev. John Seidenfeldt, from the L. M. S., labored here about 7 years with success. Permanent buildings were erected for the mission, and for many of the Hottentots; and inclosures were made for cultivation, sufficient for the subsistence of 500 families. For several years, the members of the church varied from about 60 to 80; and the scholars averaged about 50. A Bible society was also formed, and the fund was raised for the purchase of books.

After a short vacancy, the Rev. W. Anderson came hither from Griqua Town, about 1821, preached to the Hottentots, and superintended the school for a short time; but afterwards removed to Paicatsdorp, where his services were likely to prove much more useful.

Mr. Elliott has visited various places at distances from 15 to 40 miles, arriving usually on Saturday evening, and holding divine service with the family and neighbors that evening, and 3 or 4 times on the following Sabbath; wagons would arrive on these occasions from a distance of 15 or 20 miles; dinner was usually provided by the family, of which sometimes upwards 100 persons have partaken. "I mention these circumstances," says Mr. Elliott, "to show the inconvenience and expense which families in this neighborhood will sustain for the privilege of having the gospel preached to them. I have scarcely met with an individual in these parts, whose circumstances would allow it, who would not think himself favored and obliged by having his house, even on these expensive terms, converted occasionally into a place of worship."

Henry Helm is now missionary at Caledon. Sunday congregations, 160; week days, 40. The spiritual state of the people is improving. In the beginning of 1832, a meeting to pray for the country was held, and such a blessing followed the word that 40 persons were concerned for their salvation. Communicants, 21. Scholars, 94. Infant scholars, 44. A temperance society, with 150 members, has had very beneficial results.

CALPALAIM; a village in the Tanjora country, in Southern India. A number of individuals have recently renounced their Roman Catholic tenets, and placed themselves under Christian instruction.

CALTURA; a village and fortress of Ceylon, 27 miles S. of Colombo, at the mouth of one of the largest branches of the Mulwaddy, which is here about a mile wide. It washes two sides of the fort which commands it, and is navigable by boats to the sea. The adjoining country is populous, and certain native manufactures are carried on to a considerable extent. E. lon. 79° 59'. Lat. 6° 34'.

The Rev. Messrs. John A. Kenny and James Sutherland, from the W. M. S., commenced their labors in 1817. The circuit extends S. 20 miles, and N. 10; and is the intermediate one between those of Gallo and Colombo. In 1822, there were 6 schools and 229 pupils, with a suitable number of masters and catechists; and from that time to the present, the work of God has prospered. "Prayer meetings," says a missionary, "have spread a wide and gracious influence; and almost every house is open to us for the purposes of prayer and exhortation. Our congregations continue to be steadily in their attendance. Our classes, too, give us great satisfaction. At Benotte our work, from various causes, does not keep pace with the other parts of the circuit. It lies far from us, and it requires the constant and zealous efforts and holy example of a missionary, or an assistant missionary, resident there. At Pantura our work cheers us greatly.

W. Bridgell, with a native assistant, conducts the mission at Caltura. Members, 91; scholars, 806 boys and 111 girls, in 17 schools. The progress of Christianity, though slow, is encouraging.

CALUPAR; a church of Syrian Christians in the Cottayam district, in Southern India.

CAMBRIDGE; a station of the B. M. S. belonging to the larger station Falmouth, distant from it 3 miles, on the island Jamaica, West Indies.

CAMPBELL; a settlement among the Griquas, South Africa, 40 miles E. of Griqua Town, and about 700 miles N. E. of Cape Town. The Rev. Mr. Sass, from the L. M. S., removed from Bethesda to this place in 1821, and divided his labors between the Griquas and several kraals of Carraunas on the Great river. Here, however, he was encompassed, for some years, with trials and discouragements; and, in 1824, he removed to Griqua Town. In about a year afterwards a refreshing revival took place, by means of a catechist, who formed a Sabbath and a day school, instructing in the former, about 100 children, and in the latter, about 60. He still continues to be useful.

CANADA; a country of America, bounded on the N. by New Britain, E. by Labrador and the gulf of St. Lawrence, S. by New Brunswick and the United States, and W. by unknown lands. It was discovered by John and Sebastian Cabot, of Bristol, in 1497; and was settled by the French, in 1603. The summer here is very hot, and winter continuing 6 months very severe; but the sudden transitions from heat to cold, so common to the United States, are unknown in Canada, and the seasons are more regular. The uncultivated parts are a continued wood, in which are many kinds of trees unknown in Europe; but the land that is cleared is fertile, and the progress of vegetation so rapid, that wheat sowed in May is reaped in August. Of all the animals, the beaver is the most useful and curious. Canada turpentine is greatly esteemed for its balsamic qualities. This country abounds with coal, and near Quebec is a fine lead mine. The different tribes of Indians, or original natives, in Canada, are numerous; but they have been observed to decrease in population where the Europeans are most numerous, owing chiefly to their use of spirituous liquors. Canada was conquered by the English in 1759, and confirmed to them by the Treaty of the peace of 1763. In 1791, this country was divided into two provinces, Upper and Lower Canada, which have since made great progress in population and agriculture.

Lower Canada is bounded N. by New Britain, E. by New Britain and the gulf of St. Lawrence, S. E. and S. by New Brunswick and the states of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, and New York, and S. W. and W. by Upper Canada. Lon. 62° to 81° W., lat. 45° to 52° N. The inhabitants, in 1763, were 70,000; in 1814, 335,900; of whom 275,000 were native or French Canadians. In 1823, the population was 427,465. From the official census, taken in 1831, we gather the following interesting facts. 52,487 houses; 1453 houses building; 57,691 holders of real estate; 25,308, not holders of real estate. Total population, 511,917. Deaf and dumb, 458. Blind, 534. Insane, 924. Attached to the church of England, 34,620 souls, or 7 per cent.; to the church of Scotland, 15,069, 3 per cent.; Roman Catholics, 403,472, or 80 per cent.; Methodists, 7019; Baptists, 2461; Jews, 107; Scotch seceders, 7811; other denominations, 5597. The whole number of scholars in the schools, academies, colleges, and convents, is 48,320, or less than 10 per cent. of the population. In the northern part of the United States, from 20 to 25 per cent. More than one-half of the children in Lower Canada are not taught to read or write. The number of taverns and shops retailing spirituous liquors is 1592, or 1 to every 260 souls. About 24,000 persons have emigrated into the province since 1825. The climate is healthy, but the extremes of heat and cold are very great; the thermometer sometimes rising in summer to 100°, and sinking in winter to 40° below 0.

Upper Canada is bounded E. and S. E. by Lower Canada, S. by the United States, N. and W. by the unexplored regions of New Britain. Lon. 74° to 95° W., lat. 42° to 50° N. The population in 1783 was estimated at only 10,000; in 1814, at 95,000; in 1826, at 231,778. The country has chiefly been settled by emigrants from the United States, Great Britain, and Ireland. It is divided into 11 districts, which are subdivided into counties and townships. The climate is milder and more healthy than in Lower Canada. The Methodists are the most numerous religious denomination. The colored people from the United States have formed a settlement at Wilberforce.

The United Brethren, in 1792, founded a settlement in Upper Canada, on the river Retrench or Thames, which falls into lake St. Clair, in the midst of numerous tribes of the Chippeways, to which they gave the name of Fairfield. The brethren were accompanied by their Indian congregation who had been driven, in 1781, from their settlements on the Muskingum. During that interval they had removed from place to place, and found no rest till they sat down here in peace, on a tract of land, containing about 2500 acres, assigned them by the British government. The settlement became a regular township, about 12 miles long and 6 wide, and was so well cultivated that the widely fertile lands literally changed into a fruitful field. No striking success was granted in the conversion of the Indians; but their souls were a gradual increase of communicants, chiefly from the children born in the settlement, when grown up to maturity. At the close of 1812, the number of communicants was 126. After enjoying tranquillity for more than 20 years, the settlement was destroyed by the American army, under general Harrison, in 1813.

After resting for some time in huts on the site of their old buildings, they erected a town on the opposite bank of the river, to which they gave the name of New Fairfield. To this place they removed in the autumn of 1815, when their numbers amounted to 109 persons. The following year, an Indian, named Onin, who from his youth had evinced the most inveterate hatred against the missionaries, was suddenly converted to God, and was baptized, and died in the faith of the gospel. At this circumstance an impression was made both among the Indians and the white people, which afterwards led to an extensive awakening in the neighborhood.

On the 25th of June, 1822, Mr. Luckenbach wrote, that though some circumstances of a painful nature had occurred, the missionaries were enabled to rejoice that by far the greater part of their congregation continued to be faithful followers of Christ, and that their confidence in the help of the Lord was frequently revived and strengthened by proofs of his mercy towards them. A new missionary house was, at this time, partly erected; and it is stated that the Christian Indians most cheerfully lent their assistance towards the building, without any remuneration.

After 3 years had passed away without any of the heathen being publicly given to God by the rite of baptism, the missionaries had the pleasure of baptizing 3 Indian females; one on Christmas day, 1822; a second on new-year's day, 1823; and the third on the feast of the Epiphany.

The following intelligence from this settlement is contained in a letter dated October 16, 1823, in which Mr. Luckenbach wrote as follows:—"Since my last, the number of our inhabitants has been augmented by 16 persons from Goshen, 2 from among the heathen at Saudsdy, and 4 of the Money tribe. The latter is a family, consisting of an aged mother, who, four years ago, was baptized at Old Schoenbrunn, on the Muskingum, her son, grandson, and great grandson. Her son is upwards of 50 years old, and has very indifferently health. Being asked why he wished to reside in our settlement, he replied, 'I have been given to God by the rite of baptism, and I have found my place. All I long for is to experience the pardon of my sins, through the mercy of our Savior, before I die, and to be received by baptism into the Christian church. I now believe all which I formerly heard at Schoenbrunn, concerning our incarnate God and Redeemer, who died upon the cross to save us from eternal death. In this place my poor soul derives comfort and good hope; and I am therefore come to dwell among the believers, and to die with them, because among the heathen I find neither rest nor peace.'"

For further information see NEW FAIRFIELD.

The society for propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts has 63 stations in Canada, employs about 55 missionaries, and 8 schoolmasters and catechists. We have no particular account of the present condition of the districts in this society.

Missions of the Wesleyan Methodists of the United States and of Canada. Among the Indians who inhabit Upper Canada are 30,000 who speak the Chippeway or Ojibway language, scattered in different places through the province. The Mohawks are settled on Grand river, on a rich reservation of lands, 12 miles wide and 60 miles in length; and which is guaranteed to them by the British government. The head of the Mohawks was the celebrated colonel Brant, whose feasts in the revolutionary war are well known. Though civilized and well educated at Dartmouth college, where also two of his sons have been educated, it seems that he never fully embraced Christianity, so as to come fully under its influence and practical influence. Much pains had been taken to improve among the Mohawks the arts of civilized life, and they had made considerable progress in agriculture, raising sheep, cattle, &c. At the early period of the settlement, therefore, the society for Promoting Christian Knowledge had made efforts to introduce the gospel to the notice of these people. Some success attended their efforts. Mrs. Kerr, a daughter of colonel Brandt, is a firm believer in Christianity, and is a lady of rare accomplishments.

In the year 1801, a young Indian was baptized at a quarterly meeting of the Methodists, by the Rev. Joseph Sawyer, who was named, after that preacher, the society for Promoting Christian Knowledge had made efforts to introduce the gospel to the notice of these people. Some success attended their efforts. Mrs. Kerr, a daughter of colonel Brandt, is a firm believer in Christianity, and is a lady of rare accomplishments.

John Sunday, one of the natives, then rose, and, in his own language, addressed the people with a zeal and pathos seldom exhibited by our cultivated preachers. His fervent expressions of confidence in the mercy of his Father, and his appeals to Heaven, all exhibited the warmth of his heart, the reality of his religion, and the powers of his native eloquence; for although not a word was understood by his hearers, yet the effect upon the congregation was universally visible; their tears spoke the unsophisticated language of their hearts. Mr. Case then interpreted what he had said, and although much of the edge of his exhortation may have been deteriorated by the translation, yet we may readily imagine what must be the effect produced upon his Indian brethren by this good man's fervent labors among them.

Peter Jacobs, the other Indian, a youth about 19 years of age, then read several passages from the New Testament, first in English, and then in the Indian language, after the manner in which he instructs his brethren at home. The manner in which he read the parable of the lost sheep was very creditable to his head and heart. He read it exceedingly well, and his feelings obviously made a personal application of the parable to himself and his countrymen. This he fully exhibited when he had finished reading, by addressing the congregation relative to his personal experience and knowledge in the things of God. His broken English, added to the obvious simplicity and sincerity of his remarks, caused us to regard his performance with interest, and with gratifying to the hearts of all true Christians. The two Indians then sung four verses of the hymn commencing—in their own language, the congregation afterwards singing it in English.

"How happy are they,

The Rev. Dr. Bangs then rose, and after remarking that John Sunday had not understood any thing that had been said, from the ignorance of our language, proceeded to address him through his brother Indian as interpreter; and, in the name of the Christian congregation there assembled, gave him the right hand of fellowship. The flowing tears and broken sobs of this poor son of the forest, added to his loud exclamations when he understood what was said to him, was one of the most touching scenes we ever witnessed, and will never be forgotten by any one present; particularly when, to the ardent wish expressed to meet him in heaven, he responded, with melting eyes and overflowing heart, "Amen! Amen!" and "all the people" responded Amen! Amen! also.

In 1830, all the Methodist missions in Upper Canada were considered to be in a state of progressive improvement. For the benefit of the New York District Bible society had this gospel of St. Mark and several other portions of the sacred Scriptures printed in the Mohawk language. These were rendered a great blessing to those of the natives who could not understand the English language.

A new mission was also opened during the year, at Mahjodusk bay, which empties into Lake Huron. This is considered of great importance, as being the annual rendezvous of many of the Indians from the north.

The several Methodist missions among the aborigines of this country now employ 25 missionaries and 16 school-teachers, who have the care, as far as can be ascertained, of 3,066 church members and 672 scholars.

CANDY'S CREEK: a missionary station of the A. B. C. F. M. in the Cherokee nation of Indians, within the chartered limits of Tennessee, 25 miles N. E. of Brainerd, and 10 miles S. W. of the Cherokee agency on the Hiwassee river. The mission was commenced in 1821, William Holland and his wife are teachers and catechists. Mr. Holland, in a letter dated, December 24, 1831, says, "Our church at present numbers 15 Cherokee and 15 Holland and myself. E. B. Buttkus has labored here a large portion of the time since he came. During the last autumn, a meeting-house has been erected at this station at considerable expense. It is 50 feet by 30, of hewn logs, covered with short boards fastened with nails, and is by far the best and most commodious house of worship in this region. Last autumn, we held a protracted meeting of such a character as to excite pleasing sensations. In consequence, a few individuals, it is hoped, have embraced the gospel, and some are still in an inquiring state."

In consequence of the political troubles of the Indians, the operations of the mission at Candy's Creek have been much interrupted.

CANTON is the principal city of the Chinese province of the same name, situated 23° 3' N. lat. and 113° E. lon. This is the only city which the Chinese government allows for European maritime traffic. Within the boca, or mouth of the river, is a small island, which, bearing some resemblance to a tiger couchant, is called Tiger island; and the river is hence named Tiger, but the Chinese call it Taa. The city consists of 3 towns, divided by high walls, but so conjoined as to form almost a regular square. The streets are narrow, paved with small, round stones in the middle, and flagged at the sides. The houses are only a ground-floor, built of earth, and covered with tiles. The better class of people are carried about in chairs; but the common sort walk barefooted and bareheaded. The river is covered with boats, which have apartments in them for families, where many thousands reside, and have no other habitation. The number of inhabitants is supposed to be 100,000. The immense quantity of goods and money which foreign vessels bring to the city, draws hither a crowd of merchants from all the provinces; so that the factories and warehouses contain the rarest productions of the soil, and the most valuable of the Chinese manufactures. In 1823, a fire broke out, which destroyed many lives, 15,000 houses, and property to an immense amount. It is 1180 miles S. by W. from London, lon. 113° 24'.

The person deemed most suitable for this station by the L. M. S. was the Rev. Robert Morrison, whose studies at Gosport had been peculiarly directed to a preparation for so important an undertaking; and who was subsequently assisted, in London, by a native of China, in learning the language, and in transcribing a Harmony of the Gospels, and other parts of the New Testament, from a manuscript copy in the British Museum. His attention was also directed to the study of suitable tutor, to the mathematics and astronomy, and he attended the lectures at the Royal institution; this course of studies having been determined upon in consequence of some valuable information received by the directors from an intelligent correspondent at Macao.

In the month of January, 1807, Mr. Morrison sailed from England; and in the month of September he arrived at Canton, where he applied himself with unwearied assiduity to the study of the language; though, in doing this, he was obliged to observe the greatest possible secrecy, and the persons who assisted him intimated that they trembled for their own safety, under the anticipation of being discovered.

In consequence of a temporary misunderstanding between the European residents at Canton and the Chinese government, the latter prohibited all intercourse with foreigners, and the commencement of hostilities was seriously anticipated. Mr. Morrison, therefore, retired, in the beginning of November, to Macao, where he resumed the study of the language. Matters, however, were soon amicably arranged, and he returned to Canton, where, in 1809, he was appointed Chinese translator to the English factory. Alluding to this circumstance, he says, "My reasons for accepting this situation were, briefly, that it secured my residence; that its duties constituted to my improvement in the language; and that the salary attached to it would enable me to make my labor in the gospel less chargeable to the churches of Great Britain. The situation, however, whilst it has the advantages which I state, has also its disadvantages. It occupies a great part of my short life in that which does not refer to my first object. Whilst I am translating official papers I could be compiling my dictionary, which, I hope, will be of essential service to the mission."

In the course of his reading with his assistants, Mr. Morrison embraced every opportunity of speaking of the Lord Jesus, and salvation through him, as well as of the existence of the one only living and true God. On this latter subject, he observes, "their ideas are exceedingly obscure. The Chinese people, according to what I have seen, have no idea of one intelligent, independent, and perfect Being, the Creator and Governor of the world. They have, however, lords, many and gods many, before whose images they worship, and to whom they offer sacrifice. The word heaven, in their language, is exceedingly vague; and it seems impossible to determine its precise signification, as they ever vary in their definition of it. An atonement my people do not think necessary, at least for small sins; and of the pardon of great sins they have no hope."

In a letter addressed to the directors, and dated April 2d, 1812, Mr. Morrison says: "By the last fleet, which sailed about a month ago, I wrote, and inclosed you a copy of my translation of the gospel by Luke, and a Chinese tract on the Way of Salvation, which I hope would reach you in safety. I now inclose you a translation of a Chinese edict; by which you will see, that to print books on the Christian religion in China, is considered a capital crime. I must, however, go forward, trusting in the Lord: though still shall be careful not to invite the notice of the government. Indeed, notwithstanding my consciousness of my own weakness, I am not discouraged, but am thankful that my most sanguine hopes have been more than realized; as the practicability of acquiring the language in no great length of time, of translating the Scriptures, and of having them printed in Chinese, have been demonstrated. I 10 days. To this severe measure Mr. Milne was obliged to submit, and he removed to Canton, where, under suitable teachers, he applied himself assiduously to the study of the language. As European females are not permitted to reside at Canton, he was necessarily separated from Mrs. Milne, who continued with Mr. and Mrs. Morrison at Macao. Mr. Morrison, however, subsequently joined Mr. Milne for the season, which he continued 5 months."

The Rev. William Milne arrived at Macao, with Mrs. Milne, in July, 1813, as a colleague to Mr. Morrison, by whom he was most gladly received. By the instigation of the Roman Catholic clergy, however, the Portuguese government, in China, have been deconstructed. In 10 days. To this severe measure Mr. Milne was obliged to submit, and he removed to Canton, where, under suitable teachers, he applied himself assiduously to the study of the language. As European females are not permitted to reside at Canton, he was necessarily separated from Mrs. Milne, who continued with Mr. and Mrs. Morrison at Macao. Mr. Morrison, however, subsequently joined Mr. Milne for the season, which he continued 5 months."

In February, 1814, Mr. Milne left China, in a vessel which conveyed nearly 500 Chinese emigrants, for the purpose of distributing the copies of the New Testament and the tracts which he and Mr. Morrison had prepared; and he had the pleasure of seeing many, while on board, reading, in their own language, the wonderful works of God. He touched at the island of Banca, a new settlement, where the Chinese were landed, when, by permission of the commanding officer, he distributed his books.

It having been deemed of great importance to commence a mission at Malacca, Mr. Milne, at the urgent request of Mr. Morrison, removed thither in the summer of 1815.

Mr. Morrison's labors among his domestics were not in vain. One man was baptized in 1815, on a credible profession of his faith; and some others were inclined to declare themselves Christians, but were intimidated by apprehension of the consequences.

In a letter dated September 4, 1817, Mr. (now Dr.) Morrison says, "I have translated the morning and evening prayers, just as they stand in the Book of Common Prayer, altering only those which refer to the rulers of the land. These I am printing, together with the Psalter, divided for the 30 days of the month; I intend them as a help to social worship, and as affording excellent and suitable expressions for individual devotion. Mr. Milne wished to modify them, so as to render them more suitable to our peculiar circumstances; but as they possess here no authority but their own general excellence, and are not binding on the practice or conscience of any, and as they are not certainly judged it better to receive them as they are. Additional help may be afforded, if they shall not be fully adequate. The heathen, at first, require helps for social devotion; and to me it appeared, that the richness of devotional phraseology, the elevated views of the Deity, and the explicit and full recognition of the work of our Lord Jesus Christ, were so many excellencies, that a version of them into Chinese, as they were, was better than for me to new model them. The church of Scotland supplied us with a catechism; the congregational churches afforded us a form for a Christian assembly; and the church of England has supplied us with a manual of devotion, as a help to those who are not sufficiently instructed to conduct social worship without such aid. We are of no party. We recognize but two divisions of our fellow-creatures—the righteous and the wicked—those who love our Lord Jesus Christ, and those who do not." Other useful works were also executed.

On the 25th of November, 1819, the translation of the Holy Scriptures into the Chinese language was happily brought to a termination. On this interesting occasion, Dr. Morrison wrote to the directors as follows:—"To have Moses, David, and the prophets, Jesus Christ and his apostles, using their own words, and thereby declaring to the inhabitants of this land the wonderful works of God, indicates, I hope, the speedy introduction of a happier era in these parts of the world; and I trust, that the gloomy darkness of pagan scepticism will be dispelled by the day-spring from on high; and that the gilded idols of Boodha, and the numberless images which fill this land, will one day assuredly fall to the ground before the power of God's word, as the idol Dagon fell before the ark."

In the annual Report, communicated to the general meeting of the L. M. S., in 1823, the directors observe: "The completion of Dr. Morrison's Chinese and English Dictionary, (which has occupied more or less of his time during a period of 15 years,) as well as that of the Chinese version of the Holy Scriptures, forms a kind of epoch in the history of the mission.

It is due to Dr. Morrison to observe, that by means of his Chinese and English Dictionary, in conjunction with the Chinese Grammar, compiled by him, and published about 12 years ago, he has furnished for the use of English students of Chinese highly valuable facilities for attaining a knowledge of this very difficult language; and, at the same time, he has contributed to open more widely the door of access to the stores of Chinese literature and philosophy.

It is his labors in this department which are chiefly important as they supply the Christian missionary with the means of attaining with accuracy, and, as far as possible, with ease, the language of a people who compose about a fourth part of the entire population of the globe.

It may further be observed, in reference to the philological labors of Dr. Morrison, that they have also contributed to prepare the way for the future dissemination of European learning and science, through the medium of the English language, among the natives of China. The introduction of these into the empire, as objects of study, in the first place to the more learned, and gradually of education to others, would naturally tend to lessen the fetters of superstition and prejudice; to substitute for a contempt, perhaps more feigned than real, a degree of respect and veneration for the inhabitants of Europe; and thus, at length, to procure a candid attention, on the part of the more inquisitive of the Chinese at least, to the doctrines and evidences of Christianity.

Ever since the year 1813, the gospel has been more or less regularly preached, both in English and Chinese, either at Macao or Canton. Nor has this small portion of the Christian ministry, thus insulated, as it were, and confined almost to the examples of the eastern world, been wholly destitute of effect. Besides the advantages derived from these religious services by European and American residents, "there are some Chinese," to use the language of Dr. Morrison, "on whose consciences divine truth has made an impression."

On the 9th of December, 1823, Dr. Morrison embarked for England, where he arrived in safety on the 29th of March, in the ensuing year. Previous to his departure from China, he solicited, by an evangelist and imposition of hands, a native convert to the work of an evangelist among his own countrymen; secured to him a small annual stipend for the duties to be performed in discharge of his sacred obligations, and, at the same time, permitting him to pursue his secular calling, as the principal means of his support.

Shortly after Dr. Morrison's arrival in England, he had the honor to be introduced at court by Sir George Staunton, B. C. as the first Protestant missionary to China; and was presented to the king by the president of the board of control, the right honorable Charles Wyon. Dr. Morrison was permitted to lay before his majesty a copy of the Chinese version of the Holy Scriptures, made by himself and the late Dr. Milne; and also to present to the king an account of the Anglo-Chinese college and Singapore institution.

In an official communication of Sir George Staunton, dated April 12, 1824, Mr. Peel, the secretary for the home department, stated, that, in laying the Chinese Bible before the king, he had mentioned the very singular and meritorious exertions made by Dr. Morrison for the promotion of religion and literature in the East; and that he had his command to communicate his majesty's marked approbation of that gentleman's distinguished and useful labors.

Another letter was subsequently addressed to Dr. Morrison himself, by his majesty's librarian; in which the writer observes—"I have received his majesty's commands to convey to you his acknowledgement, and to express his sense of your attention in presenting, through Mr. Peel, a copy of your Chinese Bible. And his majesty has been pleased to direct me to take it into my particular care, as an important and valuable addition to his library."

After rendering many invaluable services to the cause of missions, and to that of China in particular, Dr. Morrison left England in 1826, with his family, and arrived at Macao on the 19th of September.

The first Sabbath after his arrival, he resumed the religious services he had been accustomed to perform previously to his visit to Europe. During his absence from China, Leang-a-fa composed, among other works, a small volume, in Chinese, containing explanatory notes on the epistle to the Hebrews. Of this work, considering the few advantages Afa possessed, Dr. Morrison speaks favorably. Afa had also written a small essay in favor of the Christian religion, entitled, The True Religion, in which he dwelt on the immortality of the soul, the necessity of a Savior, and shows that Jesus Christ has made an atonement for sin. He directs the attention of his countrymen to the Bible, which, he informs them, European Christians have, at a great expense, caused to be translated into Chinese, printed, and given to the people. He had likewise drawn up a short account of several interesting countries, held at different times, and certain countries, which he had casually taken up the Bible when he was himself present. Since Dr. Morrison's return, Afa has drawn up a brief statement of the religious progress of his own mind while under the tuition of the late Dr. Milne at Malacca, which, at length, issued in his determination fully to embrace Christianity.

The above accounts relative to Leang-a-fa, however in themselves pleasing, deserve the present notice, in almost universal rejection of the gospel by the inhabitants of China, with which they stand contrasted. An empire is here presented to our view, containing 150 millions of souls, involved in gross spiritual darkness; while standing, as it were, on its utmost verge, we behold a single individual of that empire defending the existence and perfections of the true God, the necessity and efficacy of our Lord's atonement for the sin of the world, and his own conversion to the Christian religion, in which he points out translated for their use, as containing words by which they may be saved. May this light, small, indeed, and comparatively dim, increase more and more, until it shall at length break forth in all the brightness of meridian day!

So fully persuaded is Dr. Morrison of the importance and utility of comments on the Scriptures, in reference to converted and inquiring heathens, that, while the present obstacles to preaching the gospel in China continue, he conceives he cannot more profitably employ his time than in composing explanatory notes on the Chinese Bible.

Under date of January 10, 1831, Dr. Morrison says, "I regret that a wide door is not opened, to send the words of eternal life through the whole length and breadth of China. Where we cannot send whole Bibles, we can yet distribute portions of the Lord's word; three modes are in operation;—the British and Foreign School society's Scripture Lessons; Dr. Hawker's Scripture Help to Prayer; and sheet tracts, containing only Scripture quotations. I have a confidence and a hope in the pure text of Holy Scripture, as derived from divine inspiration, far superior to any human composition, for the sake of the heathen. Yesterday, Leang-a-fa wrote out, for a sheet tract, that imitable exhibition of his own mind, and the words of the Lord's word, which happened to be the lesson of the day, and was read by us in our little private congregation. Afa (as we abbreviate his name) explained the Scriptures to his aged pagan father in the morning; and mentioned, with grateful hope, that the old man's heart was somewhat softened; he listened to the word; and knelt down to join in prayer to the living and true God, through Jesus Christ.

There is a Christian Union in China, consisting of a number sufficient to constitute a primitive church; according to the maxim, that "where three believers in Jesus are assembled, they form a church." A Chinese, Kewbagang, was baptized at Macao, in the beginning of 1830; he is to assist in the distribution of tracts. Dr. Morrison speaks of Leang-a-fa as dead to this world and living unto Christ; occupied in studying the Scriptures, writing and printing tracts, and visiting from house to house, to testify to the truth of the gospel of the Lord. In company of Acong, another Chinese convert, he itinerated about 250 miles in the interior, for the purpose of instructing his countrymen in the knowledge of Christ, and distributing religious tracts among them, written and printed by them with that view. The London Religious Tract society have authorized Leang-a-fa to print 18,000 tracts at their expense. In consequence, 7000 tracts were circulated last July in the interior. "Leang-a-fa has exposed the vain superstitions which delude the minds of the Chinese, in a manner," says Dr. Morrison, "which no European now living, with whom I am acquainted, could equal."

A mission was established at Canton by the A. B. C. F. M. in the beginning of 1830. The board were strongly urged to this measure by the Rev. Dr. Morrison, assisted by a benevolent American merchant, trading at Canton, the Rev. Mr. Estlin, and the Rev. Elisha C. Bridgman sailed from New York for Canton, accompanied by the Rev. David Abel, under the patronage of the American Seamen's Friend society. They arrived after a passage of 129 days. Mr. Bridgman has devoted almost his whole time, to the acquisition of the Chinese language. The establishment of a printing press at Canton was recommended by Dr. Morrison for the purpose of forming writers of moral and religious tracts adapted to the peculiar circumstances of that part of the world; and one has been presented to the board, with the necessary types and furniture, by the church and society in Bleecker street, New York. It is to be called the Broom Press, in memory of the Rev. Matthias Bruen, a late pastor of the church. It has, doubtless, arrived at the place of its destination.

SCHOOL BUNGALOW IN CEYLON.

Mr. Abel went to China as a seaman's missionary, for those speaking the English language in the port of Canton. He had, however, a conditional appointment from the committee of the Board of Missions, should he think it to be his duty, at the end of a year, to direct his whole attention to the native population. In December, 1830, he entered into the service of the board. He soon after went to Java and Siam, on an exploring tour.

Mr. S. W. Williams, a printer, has joined Mr. Bridgman. Rev. Peter Parker, M. D., sailed for the same mission on the 3d of June, 1834. Mr. Bridgman is the principal editor of the Chinese Repository, an ably conducted and very useful work. Rev. Edwin Stevens, chaplain of the A. S. F. S. for the seamen of Canton, proposes soon to join the American mission. The time of the missionaries is principally occupied in the acquisition of the language, in collecting and diffusing information, and in the preparation of books in Chinese and their distribution among the people. Mr. Dyer, of the L. M. S., has succeeded in casting metallic movable types for printing Chinese. A more simple way has been lately invented in Boston—that of procuring metallic castings, or stereotype plates, from the Chinese blocks.

Mr. Abel, after spending some time in Europe, has returned on a visit to the United States.

CAPE COLONY, or COLONY OF THE CAPE OF GOOD HOPE, South Africa. The colony extends about 250 miles from N. to S., and 550 miles from E. to W.; from 30° to 34° 30' S. lat. and from 18° to 28° E. lon. The space included within these limits is about 120,000 square miles, with a population of 1 to a square mile. On the W. and S. it is washed by the ocean, and on the N. it is bounded by a range of lofty mountains. The mountain is a stupendous mass of naked rock, rising, almost perpendicularly, about 355 feet to the height of the average amount of imports is about $1,000,000. The principal export is Cape wine. The Dutch settlers, who live in the interior, called Boors, are in a very degraded condition.

CAPE TOWN; is the capital of the territory of the Cape; a settlement founded by the Dutch. It stands on the W. side of Table bay, and is a town of 12 miles in length, surrounded by black and dreary mountains. The mountains behind the town are, Table mountain, the Sugar Loaf, the Lion's Head, Charles mount, and James mount, or the Lion's Rump. From these mountains descend several rivulets, which flow into the different bays, as Table bay, False bay, &c. Among these mountains, extending along the valleys and rivulets, are a great number of plantations; and 10 miles S. E. of the town is the celebrated Table Mountain, yielding a fine wine. This town, with its extensive colony, surrendered to the British in 1795, and was restored, in 1802, by the treaty of Amiens; it again surrendered to the British in 1806, and was finally ceded to them in 1814. Cape Town is 34 miles N. by W. from the cape. E. lon. 18° 23', S. lat. 30° 50'.

The Rev. George Thom, from the L. M. S., arrived at Cape Town in 1812, and labored zealously to promote the cause of religion, not only there, but also in other parts of the colony, for several years; and afterwards accepted the office of Dutch minister at Caledon, under the appointment of the colonial government. In 1818, the Rev. Dr. Philip, who had been appointed superintendent of the society's missions in that part of the globe, increased the congregation previously collected, and obtained permission to build a chapel. This commodious place of worship was opened, December 1, 1822. Through Dr. Philip's agency, premises have also been purchased, to be occupied, in part, as a dwelling-house by the society's resident agent, and as a temporary abode for its missionaries who may touch at the cape, disembark there, or occasionally visit it from the interior. The building will also afford facilities in aid of plans of education, which enter into the measures of the society for promoting the dissemination of the gospel in South Africa. The Rev. Mr. Cook, formerly connected with the L. M. S., who labored here for many years, with considerable effect, was at this time an important and gratuitous coadjutor; 16 heathens were united in church fellowship, and under his pastoral care. Between 300 and 400, chiefly adults, were under his weekly catechetical instruction; and the Sabbath school consisted of about 100. Through succeeding years considerable success attended the means thus employed. It being deemed necessary for Dr. Philip to visit England, his place was supplied, pro tempore, by the Rev. R. Miles. An auxiliary M. S. has been established.

The visit of Dr. Philip to England was attended with important consequences. The influence which he exerted, by his "Volume of Researches," and other means, led the way to the abolition of slavery throughout the colony. Though Dr. Philip's book was received with decided approbation in England, yet it was of such a description as inevitably to produce a very opposite sentiment at the cape of Good Hope. So many parties were necessarily implicated in the statements introduced, that it could not but excite bitter indignation against the author. Dr. Philip had not been three days at Cape Town after his return, before he received notice of an action for a libel in the supreme court of the colony. The efforts made to transfer the trial from that court to England were overruled, and the doctor was thus tried in the midst of local prejudice, and without the benefit of a jury. He was cast in damages of 200 pounds, and costs of more than 900 pounds. The directors of the L. M. S. and the British public generally entirely justified the proceedings of Dr. Philip. So strong was the sympathy felt in his behalf, that a sum not only equal to the charges incurred by the prosecution (121 pounds) has been raised, but a handsome surplus remains to be applied, according to the wishes of the donors, to the benefit of his family.

The missionaries of the L. M. S. at Cape Town are John Philip, D. D., superintendent, G. Christie and Theophilus Atkinson. Two heathens have been baptized. Scholars, 80, on Sundays; 80 girls in school on ordinary. Many tracts, Bibles, and books have been given away. The Missionary society has raised 50 pounds.

About the year 1820, the W. M. S. established a mission in Cape Town. It is principally important in its bearings on the country stations. Barnabas Shaw, James Cameron, and E. Cook are missionaries. Several religious services in Dutch have been lately undertaken for the benefit of the heathen. Their labors in the vicinity have been continued with success. Members, 78; day scholars, 80.

About 7000 tracts have been circulated by the South African Text society last year, and 10,000 copies of children's books, in Dutch, have been sent to the cape. The C. K. S. have sent 2000 pounds for the religious benefit of the colony. The schools contain 740 children. Six churches are building. An edition of 3000 Dutch Testaments is in the press at London, and the four gospels in Namaqua have been printed in Cape Town.

"African research," says the South African Advertiser, "has had many martyrs; some of them men of the highest qualifications; yet, with the exception of a few spots around its shores, the whole of this vast continent is covered from the eye of the geographer by thick darkness, and shut against the influence of the Christian philanthropist by almost universal barbarism. To conquer the physical and moral difficulties which lie in the way of African discovery seems to have been reserved for Christian missionaries, and the basis line of their most successful operations is the extensive frontier of this colony. A salubrious climate and a civilized native population give this end of Africa prodigious advantages over every other point from which the traveller, the merchant, or the missionary can attempt to penetrate those unknown regions." The missionaries of all the societies in Southern Africa can rejoice that they have not run in vain, nor labored in vain. Some of the various tribes have been gathered as first-fruits of the general harvest.

CARADIVE; an island west of Batticocha, Ceylon; on which a station of the A. B. C. F. M. was formed in 1833.

CARMEI; a station of the A. B. C. F. M. among the Cherokees, 62 miles S. E. of Brainerd, on the road from Augusta, Ga. to Nashville, Tennessee. Daniel Butrick, missionary; Isaac Proctor, teacher and catechist; with other services.

Daniel S. Butrick, missionary, and wife, now occupy Carmel; 5 persons have been received into the church, and 13 baptized. Considerable seriousness has existed.

CATTARAUGUS; an Indian reservation in the state of New York, on the eastern shore of lake Erie, about 40 miles S. W. of Buffalo. It comprises about 26,000 acres of land. A mission was commenced here in 1822 by Mr. William A. Tupper, a missionary of the United Foreign Missionary society. It is now under the care of the A. B. C. F. M. Mr. Taylor and Mrs. Taylor are employed as teachers and catechists. Many instances of hopeful conversion occurred in the winter of 1830-31. In May, 1831, 11 were received into the church, which now consists of 40. A temperance society, with more than 100 members, has been formed. The heathen chiefs recently gave permission to send of their people as might choose to attend the Christian meeting; upon which nearly all the young resolved to join the Christian party. Such a desertion was prevented by an immediate renewal of the restraints.

Asher Bliss, missionary, and wife, now occupy the station at Cattaraugus. Communicants, 45.

CANNONPORE; a town and important military station in Allahabad, Hindostan, on the W. bank of the Ganges, 49 miles S. W. of Lucknow; E. lon. 81°, N. lat. 26° 39'.

Early in 1809, the lamented Rev. Henry Martyn removed from Dinapore to this place, and continued his faithful labors among the soldiers and natives till the latter part of the following year. At the same time, he indefatigably pursued the translation of the Scriptures into Hindostanee and Persian; and procured the erection of a house for worship.

In consequence of the zeal of some pious soldiers who were quartered at Cawnpore, Nripata, one of the natives assisting the Baptist missionary at Allahabad, was sent thither in 1818, and was very useful.

Communicants in Cawnpore, in 1833, 25. Many tracts have been circulated. Mr. Greenway frequents the places of public resort, and has been heard in many of the most profitable discussions.

CEDAR-HALL; a station of the U. B. on the island Antigua. Simon, missionary.

CELEBES, or MACASSAR; an island in the Indian ocean, to the E. of Borneo. It is 500 miles from N. to S., and divided into various portions by large bays, so the breadth is commonly not above 60 miles. Square miles, about 30,000. The E. side of the island is sometimes called Celebes, and the W. Macassar; but, in general, the former name is given to the whole island. The inhabitants are Malays, consisting of several nations or tribes, and the best soldiers in these parts. The most powerful tribe are called Bagis, and have something free and dignified in their manner, superior to other Malays, and are remarkably industrious.

In the interior of the Celebes the Netherlands Missionary society have lately formed a very promising station, where the missionaries Beidel and Schanary labour, with every prospect of success among a willing people. Other missionaries are expected. Mr. Helldoorn has been very successful in the establishment of schools. Mr. Varick is now stationed on this island.

CERAM; one of the Molucca or Spice islands, in the East India ocean, near the N. E. coast of Australia, 190 miles long, and nearly 40 broad, belongs to the Dutch. The inhabitants, including 3 small islands in the vicinity, are estimated at 15,000.

The Rev. Mr. Kam's occasional visits have been instrumental of much good to the native Christians, and recently a mission has been established here under his direction.

CEYLON; an island in the Indian ocean, containing 19,496 square miles, and separated from the European coast by the strait of Manar, but united to it by Adam's bridge—a remarkable chain of sandbanks. Ceylon lies between the parallels of 5° 50' and 9° 50' N. lat.; and between 79° 20' and 81° 50' E. lon. For the first certain information respecting Ceylon, we are indebted to the Portuguese Almeida, who, in 1505, entered a port of Ceylon by accident, and was hospitably received by the natives. The Portuguese were induced to establish commerce and settlements in the island, on account of the great quantity of cinnamon which it produced; but the cruelty, the avarice, and the fanaticism which they evinced in suppressing the religion of the natives, and endeavoring to convert them to Christianity by violence, made them so much abhorred, that the Cingalese, in 1603, assisted the Dutch in driving them out of the island. By the conquest of the principal Portuguese towns, Colombo, the Dutch succeeded, in 1656, in expelling the Portuguese. But the cruelty of the natives at their imagined delirium, which induced them to cede the most valuable districts to the Dutch, was soon changed into hatred. Bloody wars ensued, in which the Europeans were the victors, and forced their opponents to seek refuge in the interior of the island, where they remained independent. In 1795, the English took possession of the island, and, at the peace of Amiens, in 1802, it was formally ceded to them. In 1815, they subjected the whole of the island to the Cingalese king of Candy. The island is subject immediately to the crown. The capital is Colombo. Its coasts are flat, and covered with rice fields, interspersed with forests of cocoa trees. The interior of the country is traversed by a chain of steep mountains, covered with wood, which divides the island into two almost equal parts, and the highest point of which is the famous Adam's peak, 6530 feet high, on which the Cingalese and the Hindoos worship the colossal footstool of Adam; who, according to their belief, was created there, and, according to the religion of Buddha, is Buddha himself. The island seems to consist of primitive rock. The climate is, on the whole, mild and healthy. Although near the equator, the heat is more moderate than on the continent, on account of the sea-breezes. The difference between the longest and shortest day is not more than 15 minutes. All the tropical fruits grow wild. The chief production is the cinnamon tree. The best and most prolific cinnamon woods, called the cinnamon gardens, are situated on the coasts. The annual produce is about 400,000 pounds. Colquhoun estimates the inhabitants at 6000 whites and 800,000 natives. According to others, the number exceeds 2,000,000. The native inhabitants are divided into the Hindus, a rude people living in the interior of the island, who have retained the degree of civilization. The Cingalese are divided into certain castes, like the Hindoos, of which each has its separate laws, customs, and dress, and are of the religion of Buddha. Besides these, there are Hindoos and Moors. The excessive and habitual superstitions of the Cingalese may be learned from the following facts. If they intend to set out on a journey, and hear a lizard chirp, or see what they think a strange sight, they do not start that day. If a person takes medicine, he will eat only on some particular day of the week. If they hear a dog howling, which is not bound, it portends ill to them or their families. Towards the conclusion of the year, they tie a strip of a cocoa-nut leaf round many trees in their gardens; on the eve of the new year, they call the priest, and, with some ceremony, loose them. There is, indeed, a vast system of error and superstition, which pervades the whole of the island.

We shall give an account of the various efforts to christianize Ceylon under the particular towns and stations. It will be sufficient, in this place, to give some of the general results.

The British and Foreign Bible society have caused 2,500 copies of Genesis and of the New Testament to be printed in Jewish Portuguese. The auxiliary will print 2000 copies of the Pentateuch and Psalter, and 5000 more of the New Testament. The four gospels in Fali have been finished. The Bible in Ceylon is working a great change. The Java Branch Tract society published in the year 94,745 tracts, making a total of 378,052. The parent society set out 17,970 publications. The Church Missionary society has 4 stations, 8 ordained missionaries, 83 native assistants. Average attendance on public worship, 935 in Cingalese and 539 in Tamil; communicants, 65; seminarists, 60; schools, 56; scholars, 1762, of whom 240 are girls. About 90,000 tracts, portions of Scripture, &c. had been printed during the last year. The Wesleyans have 10 stations and 5 outstations, 8 missionaries, 17 native assistants, 512 members; scholars, about 4500. American Board of Missions has 6 stations, 9 missionaries, 220 communicants, 63 native assistants, 175 seminarists, 3165 scholars, and 78 village free schools.

CHANGANORE, a town in the Syrian churches, in the Cottayam tract, Southern India, built about 1000 years ago of granite stone; 640 houses connected with it. In 1831, 150 baptisms.

CHANGANY, or CHANGANE; a parish in Ceylon, about 2 miles N. of Batticoita. The American missionaries at Batticoita have bestowed much attention on the people here in preaching, distributing Scripture tracts, and establishing schools. In 1818, a large school was opened, which is supported by the Syrian church of Charleston, South Carolina. The missionaries have opened 2 other schools in this parish, in the villages of Moolai and Sitenkerney. Many seem anxious to receive religious instruction.

CHARLESTOWN; a station of the D. M. S., belonging to Anotta Bay, on the island Jamaica, West Indies.

CHARLOTTE; a town of liberated Africans, in the parish of St. John, Sierra Leone, West Africa. In 1817, the inhabitants amounted to only 85. In 1823, there were 676.

The C. M. S., in 1819, sent hither Mr. Christopher Taylor and Mrs. Taylor, school-teachers, and Mr. John Jackson, native assistant. The progress of education was pleasing, and habits of industry had been happily introduced. A school-house, 30 feet by 30, was built, and was used as a place of worship, but was soon found insufficient. A missionary association was formed, and 6 native teachers appointed, who faithfully discharged the duties of their office. It having been suggested that produce would be received in lieu of money, 167 bushels of cassava were presented in the course of a few days. The amount of contributions, in 1824, was 26 pounds 6 shillings. Since that time Mr. Taylor has died, but other laborers have been sent.

CHAVACHERY; a new station of the A. B. C. F. M., in Ceylon. John Scudder, M. D., missionary and wife.

CHEKOKES; a tribe of the aborigines of North America. The following seem to have been the original limits of their territory, viz. From the mouth of Duck river, in the state of Tennessee, on the west, to the waters of French Broad, in North Carolina, on the east; and thence the head waters of the Holston, in Virginia, on the north, to some point on the head waters of the Oconee, in Georgia, on the south; computing besides what is now the Cherokee country, more than half of the state of Tennessee, the southern part of Kentucky, the south-west corner of Virginia, a considerable portion of both the Carolinas, a small portion of Georgia, and the northern part of Alabama. This tract probably contained more than 35,000,000 acres, of which a large portion is extremely fertile, and of it not inferior to any land in North America. Of all this vast tract, they had sold, previously to 1820, all but about 8,000,000 of acres. About 5,000,000 of this remainder falls within the chartered limits of Georgia, 1,000,000 of acres within Alabama, and the remainder within North Carolina and Tennessee. In the revolutionary contest, the Cherokees took part with the king of Great Britain, under whose protection they then considered themselves, as they now consider themselves to be under the protection of the United States. Between the years 1785 and 1819, sixteen treaties were made between the Cherokees and the United States, negotiated and ratified by 5 presidents, Washington, Adams, Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe, all resting on the same principles, all consistent with each other, and all now in force, except that some parts have become obsolete by subsequent stipulations on the same subjects. The earlier treaties are repeatedly and solemnly recognised by later ones. In none of these treaties is the original right of the Indians declared to be defective. In none of them it is said that the Indians have not the power of self-government. In no case have the Indians signed away their inheritance. The doctrine of the government, in all its treaties with the Cherokees, have been always directed to one point; viz. to satisfy the Indians that the government would deal justly and faithfully by them, would perform all its engagements, and would secure to them the permanent possessions of their country. They were constantly urged to become farmers, to educate their children, and form a regular government for themselves. In the treaty of 1819, executed by the Hon. John C. Calhoun, there was a provision for selling a tract of land, the proceeds of which were to be vested by the president of the United States, and the annual income to be applied "to diffuse the blessings of education among the Cherokee nation on this side of the Mississippi." To fulfil the benevolent intentions of the United States to the greatest advantage, as well as to carry the gospel of the love of God to the Indians, B. C. F. M. missionaries, 1816, departed the Rev. Cyrus Kingsbury to visit the Cherokee Indians, and adopt measures preparatory to a mission and school establishment. His design was warmly approved and seconded by the principal chiefs of the Cherokees. In the beginning of 1817, he was joined by the Rev. Messrs. Hall and Williams. A church was soon formed; schools were commenced, other missionaries and laborers arrived, and the divine Spirit abundantly affected the hearts of the Indians. In 1816, departed the exception of the serious difficulties and embarrassments which have been experienced by the interference of Georgia, the mission has been one of great interest, and of almost uniform success.

Owing to the political disturbances of the people, the present aspect of the Cherokee mission is full of confusion and discouragement. Most of the influential men in the nation have departed, and the moral and intellectual elevation of the people. All the members but three or four of the national council have subscribed to the pledge of total abstinence from ardent spirits.

"The mission among the Cherokees," says the editor of the Missionary Herald, in 1832, "has now been established more than 14 years. The mass of the people in their dress, houses, furniture, agricultural implements manner of cultivating the soil, raising stock, providing for their families, and in their estimate of the value of an education, will not suffer greatly by comparison with the whites in the surrounding settlements. The mass of the people have externally embraced the Christian religion. They have a regular system of civil government, founded on liberal principles, and administered with a good degree of decorum and energy. Intemperance has been checked. The laws of the nation rigorously exclude intoxicating liquors from all public assemblies, and otherwise restrict its introduction and use. Numerous associations for the promotion of temperance have been organized, and joined by large numbers. Some notoriously intemperate persons have been reformed, and others have been arrested in their fatal course. But these favorable prospects are now overcast with a dark cloud. In 1830, a compact was made between the United States and Georgia, by which a long controversy was settled, and the United States bound themselves to extinguish the Indian title to lands within the chartered limits of that state. The obligation was conditional, however; and there was nothing in the compact which implied that the United States did not acknowledge the perfect right of the Indians to the possession and use of their lands. Previous to this, in 1815, the Cherokees have refused to sell any land. In December, 1827, the government of Georgia assumed an attitude entirely new, by declaring that she has a perfect title, by the right of discovery, to all the land within her chartered limits; that the Indians have no title, but a mere occupancy, determinable at the pleasure of Georgia; that she may take possession of their lands by force; and that the United States are bound to extinguish the Indian title, either by negotiation or force. In 1828 and 1829, Georgia extended her laws over the Cherokees, and enacted several provisions of a most oppressive character. The Cherokees immediately asked the protection of the United States. The president informed them that he had no constitutional power to protect them. They next petitioned congress; and while their petition was pending, a bill was introduced into congress for the purpose of selling them the residue of their lands, under the name of 'Pre-emption to this, however, a series of articles had appeared in the Washington National Intelligencer, under the signature of William Penn, written by the late Jeremiah Evarts, Esq. of Boston, in which the whole subject was very ably discussed, and the rights of the Cherokees unanswerably vindicated. The bill for the removal of the Indians, after a discussion of almost two weeks, passed the National Intelligencer, on the 24th of April, 1830, by a vote of 28 to 20; and the house, on the 26th of May, by a vote of 103 to 97. Since that time, the Cherokees have been in a state of great agitation. Their government has been hindered in its operations, their laws counteracted by the extension of the jurisdiction of the state of Georgia over their territory, and many of their citizens have been imprisoned. The missionaries of the board have been forbidden to reside among them, and the same has been the case with Mr. and Mrs. Worcester and Dr. Butler, for the same cause, have been tried and sentenced to the Georgia penitentiary for the term of 4 years. The case of the imprisoned missionaries was brought before the supreme court of the United States, in February, 1832. On the 3d of March, the opinion of the court was given in favor of the missionaries, and an order issued for their release. The missionaries were afterwards sat at liberty, not on the ground of receiving a pardon, for they had done nothing amiss, but as an act of justice, and from regard to the peace of the country.

Mr. and Mrs. O'Brian are the missionaries of the A. B. B. among the Cherokees. The emigrants from the east of the Mississippi are gradually settling around them. Communicants, 20. A school is continued, with increasing interest.

CHILAW; an outpost, attached to Negombo, 20 miles N. of Colombo, Ceylon, under the care of the W. M. S.

CHICKASAWS; Indians, whose country lies mostly within the chartered limits of the state of Mississippi, about 120 miles square. Their country is well watered, and is well adapted to the culture of cotton, corn, wheat, &c. Cotton, beef, and pork, are the principal articles of exportation. About 1000 bales were exported in 1830. Every head of a family cultivates the earth more or less. For the last 10 years, the men, instead of the women, have almost universally cultivated the earth, while the women attend to their appropriate duties.

A school was established among this people by the Cumberland M. S. in 1821, containing between 30 and 30 scholars. The government of the United States allowed 400 dollars annually to this institution.

The M. S. of the Synod of South Carolina and Georgia also selected a station, in 1821, situated within the chartered limits of Mississippi, about 50 miles from its eastern boundary, on an elevated spot of the dividing ridge between the waters of the Tombigbee and Yazoo, 2 miles S. of Mackintoshville, about 40 miles from the town of Columbus. This station was called Monroe. Eighteen months were occupied in clearing land and erecting buildings. In 1823, about 40 acres were under cultivation. In May, 1822, the school commenced; the average number of scholars, who were orderly and industrious, was about 50. Religious meetings were well attended, and several persons hopefully embraced the truth.

The mission was transferred to the A. B. C. F. M. The following statement will show its present condition.

The only mission stations to the Chickasaws now maintained are at Monroe, and in Tipton county, Tennessee. Four persons were admitted into the church last year, and two died in the Lord. Great mischief has resulted from the introduction of ardent spirits into the nation. A school is in successful operation. It is probable that the Chickasaws will soon be settled and amalgamated with other tribes.

CHINA Proper extends from the great wall on the north, which separates it from Chinese Tartary, to the Chinese sea, about 1300 miles; and about the same distance from the Pacific ocean on the E., to the frontiers of Thibet on the W.; lying between 100° and 120° E. lon., and between 21° and 41° N. lat. The territories of the empire embrace the provinces of Auria, Mongolia, and the whole of Central Asia, between Hindostan and Asiatic Russia. On the W. it is separated from Independent Tartary by a chain of mountains.

The language is not only one of the most ancient in the world, but is, perhaps, the only one of the early ages which is still spoken by the living. It is supposed to be used by about one-third part of the inhabitants of the globe. It possesses much ancient literature, which has been, for many centuries, the constant study of the literati of China; who have polished it to a high degree of what they deem an elegant conciseness, and richness of classical quotation and allusion; so that the written style of the learned is nearly as different from the plain language of the people, as that of ancient Rome from the modern dialects of Europe. This language, the most singular upon earth in its construction, and supposed to be so difficult, supposed to bear a resemblance to something in the visible heavens; to some star or constellation, to some motions, supposed or real, to some grand terrestrial objects, or to some recondit physical principle. They often judge of the intentions of Providence with regard to the events of war, and the destiny of nations, from the appearances in the heavens. Of old, they sent forth their armies, they overturned thrones, they punished oppressors, they seized on territory; all in obedience to the suggestions of the aspects of celestial phenomena. If these erroneous conceptions be joined their antipathy, their vast population, their immense riches, their defect in scientific improvements, their want of sound principles, and, especially, the depravity of the human heart, which they have in common with others, we can hardly wonder at the high and exclusive tone which they assume, or at their extravagant claims to superiority over the nations of the earth.

The government is patriarchal. The emperor is absolute. The first principle instilled into the people, is to respect their superiors with high reverence as almighty lords. All places of honor or profit are at his disposal, as well as the lives and property of his subjects. He is seldom seen, and never addressed but on the knees. Of the officers, or mandarins, there are nine classes, from the judge of the village to the prime minister.

The national pride, and exclusive claim to pre-eminence, of the Chinese, derives most powerful support from the vain idea that their government is formed on the model of nature, and is a transcript of the noblest of its visible parts, viz., the heavens. The form of their cities, the regulation of the palace, the duties of prince and people, the evolutions of their armies, the order of their standards, the fashion of their chariots, the ascent and descent, the arrangements at their feasts, and even the very shape and fashion of their garments, &c. &c., were all anciently, and still are in a good degree, supposed to bear a resemblance to something in the visible heavens; to some star or constellation, to some motions, supposed or real, to some grand terrestrial objects, or to some recondit physical principle. They often judge of the intentions of Providence with regard to the events of war, and the destiny of nations, from the appearances in the heavens. Of old, they sent forth their armies, they overturned thrones, they punished oppressors, they seized on territory; all in obedience to the suggestions of the aspects of celestial phenomena. If these erroneous conceptions be joined their antipathy, their vast population, their immense riches, their defect in scientific improvements, their want of sound principles, and, especially, the depravity of the human heart, which they have in common with others, we can hardly wonder at the high and exclusive tone which they assume, or at their extravagant claims to superiority over the nations of the earth.

The religion of China is a strange mixture of superstitions, of which every one receives or rejects as much as he pleases. From time immemorial, peculiar homage has been paid to the memory of the dead by the Chinese. What is known of their religion prevails to the time of Confucius, is obscure and uncertain. The most celebrated ancient philosopher of China was born about 450 years before the Christian era; and seemed designed to reform, in some measure, the corruption which prevailed in the civil and religious establishments of his country. He condemned the idolatry practised by his countrymen, and maintained that Deity was the most pure and perfect principle; eternal, infinite, indestructible, omnipotent, and omnipresent. He considered the sun, moon, &c. the immediate agent of Deity, inseparably connected with him, and, as such, worthy worship. Many parts of his doctrine were calculated to preserve the superstitious notions still prevalent. By his sage counsels, his moral doctrine, and exemplary conduct, he obtained an immortal name, as the reformer of his country; and, from respect to his memory, his descendants enjoy, by inheritance, the title and office of mandarin.

Soon after his death, a species of Lamaism was introduced into China from Thibet; and, about the year 65, the sect of Fo was introduced from India. The name was derived from the idol Fo, supposed to be the Buddha of Hindostan. About the fifteenth century, many of the literati embraced a new system, nearly allied to atheism; but this is confined to a few. The Chinese, in general, are so far from being atheists, that they go into the opposite extremes of polytheism. In China no religion is preferred or encouraged by government. At the present time, its gods are, to use an expression of the sect of Fuk hang-bo-sha-suo, i. e. "in number like the sands of Hang river." Most of the forms of mythology which make any figure in the mass of history now exist in China, except that their indecent parts, and their direct tendency to injure human life, have been cut off. The idolatry of ancient Canaan, of Egypt, of Greece, of Rome, of Chaldaea, and of India, are all to be found here, though with some slight variations. Chi-na has her Diana, her Æolus, her Ceres, her Esculapius, her Mars, her Mercury, her Neptune, and her Pluto, as well as the western pantheon. She has gods celestial, terrestrial, and subterranean; gods of the hills, of the valleys, of the woods, of the districts, of the family, of the shop, and of the kitchen! She adores the gods who are supposed to preside over the thunder, the rain, and the fire; over the grain, over births, and deaths, and over the small-pox. "She worships the gentils of the mountains, rivers, lakes, and seas; together with birds, beasts, and fishes. She addresses prayers and offers sacrifices to the spirits of departed kings, sages, heroes, and parents, whether good or bad. Her idols are silver and gold, wood and stone, and clay, carved or molten, the work of men's hands. Her altars are on the high hills, in the groves, under the green trees. She has set up her idols at the corners of the streets, on the sides of the highways, on the banks of canals, in boats, and in ships. Astrology, divination, geomancy, necromancy, and magic, prevail. Spells and charms, every one possesses: they are hung about the neck, or stitched up in their clothes, or tied to the bedposts, or written on the doors; and few men think their persons, children, shops, boats, or goods, safe without them. The emperors of China, her statesmen, her merchants, her people, and her philosophers also, are all idolaters.

With regard to their religious restrictions, those of the sect of Confucius profess to be more liberal than those of the sect of Fo. They do not positively shall enjoy on earth: hence their views rise up higher; in their fears and hopes seem to terminate.

The elysium of the West, which the followers of Fuk look for, is such as the deluded imagination of an Asiatic would naturally paint: fortified palaces; groves of trees producing gems; pools of fragrant water, yielding the lotus flower as large as the wheel of a cart; showers of sweet odors, falling on a land the dust of which is yellow gold; myriads of birds, of the most exquisite plumage, singing on trees of gold, with the most harmonious and ravishing notes, of a hundred thousand kinds, &c. &c. Such is their paradise: but, in conformity with the comparative contempt in which the female character is held throughout the East, they exclude all women, as such, from a participation therein. Those females who have acted well on earth are first transformed into men, and then admitted into that palace of delights.

The sufferings of the Tartars which their terrified imaginations have figured, are represented in pictures, as the punishments in purgatory and Tartarus were exhibited in the Eleusinia and other heathen mysteries; with this difference, however, that these are exposed to public view; these were seen by the initiated only. They are boiled in the water of caldrons; they are roasted on the spit of a cart; they are roasted in caldrons; the wheel, or apparatus, by means of which all the operations of the metempsychosis are performed; horned demons, with swords, spears, hatchets, and hooks; wretched mortals alternately shivering with indescribable cold, and burnt to coals with devouring fire;—these, with numberless other such things, are represented with gross and disgusting minuteness. Instead of producing any salutary fear in the mind, they fill the imagination with horrid figures, the real existence of which the better informed surely cannot believe; or which, if believed, must either totally weaken the springs of action, or render those deluded heathens inconceivably wretched even in this life.

Their system of morals, as explained by the sect of the learned, contains much that is good. Many of the duties of relative life are set forth with as much clearness as could be expected from a people who know not the true God. As to those who call themselves Christians, the tenets of Christianity which they contained in the New Testament, it must in all particulars appear defective, and in many exceedingly erroneous; especially if the motives and ends of human actions, and the spirit in which they should be performed, be taken into the account. Some important duties are also entirely left out; and others carried to such extravagant lengths, as to render them not only irksome, but oppressive.

Females in general, who are still regarded as inferior, had not originally sprung from their doctrine of Yin and Yang, which sets every thing masculine in so exalted, and every thing feminine in so inferior, a light, was doubtless greatly increased thereby.

Their general belief in the metempsychosis, and in the inevitable decisions of a numerical fate, prevents the cordial exercise of benevolence and beneficence.

Females, who are still regarded as inferior, had not originally sprung from their doctrine of Yin and Yang, which sets every thing masculine in so exalted, and every thing feminine in so inferior, a light, was doubtless greatly increased thereby.

a criminal selfishness, hardness of heart, and indifference to other people's happiness, which sometimes allows them even to sit still at ease, and suffer another man, close by, to drown in the waves, or his property to consume in the flames, when a little effort on their part might save both.

It is true, indeed, that some of the more rational condemn these evils, and have written against them; especially against the female infanticide, and how little avail can all such well-meant efforts to correct the horrid crime be, while the principles which gave it birth are held in honor! They are inconsistent with themselves. In one part of their writings they deplore the bitter consequences, and warn men against them; while, in the other, they inadvertently magnify the causes from which they rise, by only some degree of excision and perfection in the universe. They deprecate the mortal stream, and yet feed the impoisoned fountain; they strive to lop the branches, and yet manure the root!

Though vice, in all its diversified forms, exists in China, still, perhaps, its external features do not at first sight appear so gross as in some other countries. But it is not to be concluded from hence, that the degree of it is less than in other parts of the heathen world. For the opinions and customs of all ranks of society not only furnish sufficient excuse for the commission of many sins against the law of God, but have even raised them to a certain degree of respectability and honor; and hence it becomes very difficult to convince them of the moral turpitude of those evils in which their parents, and their best and noblest men, have long ago indulged. China is filthy, manes, and customs are thrown into an irregular and digested form, as that a stranger, but superficially acquainted with the language and real spirit of the Chinese people, seems to see much to praise, and, comparatively, little to blame: while, at the same time, the nation groans under oppression and violence; their courts are filled with bribery and injustice; their markets with cozening and deceit; their houses with concubines; their monasteries with ignorant, indolent, and filthy ascetics, "who," to use the words of a Chinese writer, "are not worth the down of a feather to society;" their schools and colleges with high-minded, self-sufficient literati, to whose proud and sophisticated minds the humbling doctrines of the gospel will be never obnoxious than they were to the sarcastic pride of a Celsus!

Such is the state of China. Such, after enjoying the philosophy of Confucius for more than 2000 years! Such, after Roman Catholic Christianity has existed in it for upwards of two centuries! Such it was when the mission to China was proposed, and such it is at the present hour. (See CANTON, and MACAO.)

For the following statements respecting the efforts of the Roman Catholics in China, we are indebted to the American Quarterly Register, for February, 1832.

Xavier's desires, and attempts to open a way into China are well known. He died, however, before he reached that country. Matteo Ricci, a Jesuit, and distinguished man, of a noble family of Macerata, was the first who entered upon this important field of missions. He had arrived at Goa, in 1578, and had studied the Chinese language there. He reached Cochin, in Canton, in 1583. To ingratiate himself with the Chinese, as well as to refute their proud notion that China constituted the greatest part of the earth, he drew an atlas for them, a thing never seen there before. To prevent, however, the unpleasant sensation which the largeness of the world, in comparison to China, was calculated to excite in the Chinese, he put the first meridian in China. Notwithstanding this and other important services which he rendered to the people, he could not get access to the emperor until 1601, and then he effected it only by suggesting that he had some curious presents to bring to his majesty. Ricci was now in his sphere, having obtained permission for the Jesuits to own a house, with revenues, at Peking. He first assumed the humble apparel of a bonze; but as soon as circumstances required it, he dressed with all the splendor of a mandarin. Ricci now labored assiduously and successfully for the conversion of the great court. Still he and his companions were in continual danger. By the machinations of the bonzes, who soon became violently opposed to them, they were once on the point of being expelled from China. Ricci averted the catastrophe (as Wolf states in his History of the Jesuits) by scattering secretly a libel on the emperor, and accusing the bonze who was at the head of their enemies of having composed the piece. The emperor believed it, and the miserable bonze expired under a fearful bananle upon the scales of his fate. Soon after, the suspicions against the Jesuits still continuing, Mr. Martinez, a Jesuit, was seized by the governor of Canton, and died under the same terrible punishment. Ricci labored in China 27 years, and died at Peking, in 1610. The progress of the Jesuits in China was very rapid, after the first obstacles were overcome. By raising the science of mathematics, to which the Chinese attach a kind of sacredness, far above that degree to which it is entitled, he had been able to carry it, the Jesuits acquired an almost unbounded influence. They penetrated China in all directions, and made converts among the high and low without number. The empress Helena, one of their converts, was induced by them to write a letter to the pope, Alexander VII., in the humblest possible terms, calling herself his servant, an unworthy, poor Chinese woman. She kneeled on her knees, and with her face to the ground, to favor her with a word of acceptance, she expressed her entire subjection to his holiness, and begs him to send to China some more of the holy Jesuits, &c., dated December, 1650. In 1655, the Jesuits were on the pinnacle of glory in China. Adam Schall, a German by birth, but a consummate Jesuit, became a mandarin of the first order, and president of the tribunal of mathematics at Peking. The emperor was never before used to leave his palace, on any occasion whatever; but Schall the emperor paid more than 20 personal visits, within two years! One of his birth-days, when he ought to have received on his throne the congratulations of his court, he spent wholly in the private dwelling of Schall. A great number of Jesuits was now admitted into the empire, among whom was P. Verbiest, who afterwards became a mandarin of the first order. Schall was intrusted with the helm of the throne, and his influence seemed to have no bounds. When the Dutch endeavored to establish their commerce in China, and came with immense presents to the emperor to obtain permission to traffic in his dominions, it cost Schall but a word to prejudice the monarch against them, and frustrate their whole plan entirely. I pass over all the quarrels of the Jesuits with the Dominicans and the Capuchins. They were the ruin of Roman Catholicism in China. Worthy of notice is the courage with which the Jesuits encountered danger, imprisonment, and even death, in times of persecution, and the intrepidity with which they often entered the field again, when it was smothered with the blood of their martyrs. Once, after a season of persecution, four Jesuits entered upon the field again, and were seized and decapitated. After making all due allowance for the fact that the Edificantes Lettres were written by Jesuits, the sufferings related in the second and third volumes must have matter of fact at the bottom, sufficient to form a considerable martyrology. Yet persecution did not at first affect very sensibly their success in making proselytes, and actually never hurt them in the least, if the power of truth had been on their side. The series of calamities which at last reduced popery to the low state in which it is at present, began during the lifetime of Schall. He himself, together with other Jesuits, was put into chains, and though released again after some time, he died from the consequences of the hardships and deprivations of his imprisonment. Towards the close of the seventeenth century, the difficulties between the Jesuits and the Dominicans and Capuchins increased, and Roman Catholicism in China declined correspondingly. Persecutions at last followed. After all the missionaries were expelled from the empire, some of the Jesuits still remained at Peking in the capacity of mathematicians, retained much influence, and remained in the possession of three houses in the city, each of which carried them the annual revenue 50,000 German dollars. In 1780, Mr. Halle, a Jesuit of Suabia, was yet a mandarin and president of the mathematical tribunal at Peking.

"From the annals of the Propaganda, the work above mentioned, it appears that China is by no means given up by them; on the contrary, the efforts to reduce it to the pope are becoming more vigorous now. There is still a bishop at Su-Tshuen, and a college at the confines of the province. In 1827 they suffered somewhat, but none of their converts apostatized. About 1,800 leaguers on the north of Su-Tshuen, at Yel-King, there are living above 200 Roman Catholic exiles, with 4 priests to minister unto them. In 1823, the apostolic vicar of Chancy sent a priest there, to visit them and strengthen them in the faith. The same year the emperor permitted all to return to their homes, if they would forsake their new religion. Only five individuals made use of their permission.

"From the mission of Tong-King, the intelligences from 1825 state, that the present King, Minh-Menh, though he does not literally persecute the missionaries, yet he will not permit any new ones to enter into his dominions. Those who have been in the empire for some time he keeps in the capital, under his immediate inspection, pretending to have European papers which he wishes them to translate for him, but probably to send them away as soon as convenient. There are, at present, Mr. Lenger, apostolic vicar, and three priests, one of whom, Mr. Poudroux, embarked for the mission in 1827. The mission prospers in spite of all these hindrances. In 1825, they baptized 297 individuals, and in 1826, 1,006. The number of ecclesiastical functions performed, at that single mission, during one year, will give us an idea of the prosperity of the mission, and the activity of the missionaries. In 1826, they baptized children of believers, 3,237, and of unbelievers, about 1000; adults, 1,006; confirmed baptisms, administered by catechists or Christians, during the absence of a priest, 5,265; heard confessions, 177,456; administered the communion 78,692 times; viatic, 1,303; extreme unctions, 2,706. They had marriages, 943, and confirmations, 3,541." (From a letter of Mr. Messen, missionary at Bon-Baog, March 25th, 1827.)

According to a census taken in 1813, under the authority of the emperor Kea-King, the official returns carried the population of China to the amount of 362,447,183 souls. The harvest in China is indeed great, but the laborers are few. Preachers, and teachers, and writers, and printers in much larger numbers are wanted, to spread the knowledge of God and his mercy among the Chinese language nations. The Jesuits of Calcutta, at Malacca, the Canton newspapers, and the Chinese Repository, have all risen up since Dr. Morrison commenced his mission. Missionary voyages have been performed, particularly by Mr. Gutzlaff, and the Chinese sought out at various places under European control, in the Archipelago, as well as in Siam, at the Loochoo islands, at Corea, and along the coast of China itself, up to the very walls of Peking.

Leanne-fa is much occupied in printing. On Sundays, he explains the Scriptures to such persons as he can collect. Only 10 Chinese have been baptized. The language was formerly thought to be an insurmountable difficulty, but it has been overcome. Dictionaries, grammars, vocabularies, and translations have been penned and printed.

CHINSURAH: a town of Hindustan, in Bengal, was a fortress. It stands on the banks of the Hooghly river. The principal houses are built of brick, with terraced roofs, in the Moorish style. In consequence of a convention entered into on the part of his Britannic majesty with the king of the Netherlands, it was ceded to the English in 1825.

The Rev. Robert May, who was sent out by the L. M. S., with a view of aiding the mission at Yezagpur, especially by the translation of the scriptures into the vernacular language, was enabled, after long detention in America, to proceed to Calcutta. He landed at Calcutta, November 21, 1812, and, by a peculiar concurrence of circumstances, was led to settle at Chinsurah. Soon after entering on his labors, he was bereaved of Mrs. May.

In 1816, the number of schools under Mr. May's care was 30, to which there were more than 25000 children, especially by the translation of the scriptures into the vernacular language. The Rev. Mr. Pearson, who was highly qualified for the work, was afterwards sent out to his assistance; and he was also joined by an European, Mr. Harle, who was fully approved by Mr. Townley and himself, to assist in the superintendance of these seminaries. In the benevolent effort still further to extend the means of instruction, Mr. May finished his earthly career. Mr. Pearson received from the inhabitants a written request to superintend the schools, which he accepted, and which he accepted. With vigor and success, he, with his colleague, Mr. Harle, carried on the schools; and into one or two of them the British system was introduced, in which it approached the perfection exhibited in England, in schools conducted on the same principle.

Messrs. Twenley and Hampson, who visited the schools at Chinsurah and its vicinity in 1819, reported, that they were in the most prosperous state; and of the schools at Bankipore, under the particular superintendance of Mr. Harie, their account was equally favorable.

In addition to these engagements, the missionaries were variously occupied.

Mr. Pearson established a printing press partly under the patronage of Calcutta School S., the profits of which he designed to devote to the Bengal A. M. S.

The native schools at this station were visited by many respectable individuals of intelligence and discernment, who highly admired their economy, and regarded them as models for all schools of this description. The manner in which they were conducted met also with the entire approbation of his excellency Mr. Overbeck, the Dutch governor of Chinsurah, by whose liberality, on the part of his government, they were supported.

The Chinsurah schools were gratuitously supplied with books by the Calcutta School Book society, who ordered 1000 copies of Mr. Pearson's Bengalee and English grammar to be printed at their sole expense.

Religious books in Bengalee were extensively circulated, and scarcely a day passed without numerous applications for them at the mission-houses.

In 1820, a bungalow chapel was erected on the outside of one of the gates of the town. Here, or on the road-side, the missionaries daily took their stand.

In 1821, an additional native school commenced at a village called Khonnian; the expense of which was defrayed by his highness the rajah of Burdwan. The active exertions of Mr. Pearson in this department, also, received the express approbation of his excellency the viceroy of Hindoos.

The indifereat state of Mr. Pearson's health rendered a visit to England necessary, where he arrived on the 8th April, 1824.

At the close of the year, the Rev. John Edmonds and Mrs. Edmonds arrived at Chinsurah, to the joy of Mr. Mundy, who greatly rejoiced at the success of the mission, and was deeply suffering from the loss of Mrs. Mundy, who departed this life, after a short illness, on the 30th of the month of July. This pleasure was, unhappily, of short duration. Mrs. Edmonds being incapable of bearing the climate, Mr. Edmonds was reluctantly obliged to return with her to England, which they reached, March 29, 1827. Mr. Pearson, who embarked on his return to India on the 20th of June, arrived safe at Chinsurah, and resumed the superintendance of the native schools.

The Rev. A. F. Lacroix, formerly of the Netherlands society, the committee of which had deputed it expedient to relinquish their mission in this part of the world, was recently received into connexion with the L. M. S., and will, for the present at least, act in concert with its missionaries at this station, where he had for several years previously labored.

The inhabitants of Chinsurah are 30,000. George Mundy, missionary. Mr. Higgs ill in the beginning of December, 1832. No recent report of the state of the mission.

CHIPPWAYS. (See OUIDWAYS.)

CHIRRAPOONJEE: a station of the Serampore Baptists, beyond Siltet, in the east of Bengal, commenced in 1832. A. B. Lish, missionary. He has been placed here principally for the benefit of the Kassees, who are an interesting people, without much religion of any kind. The New Testament has been translated for them.

CHITTORE: a village in the north part of Calcutta. The C. K. S. has recently established a promising native school here.

Chitpore is now an outstation of the B. M. S. where, with several other villages, Mr. G. Pearce holds regular services.

CHITTAGONG: a district in the S. E. part of Bengal, Hindoos; extending 120 miles, by 25, average breadth; separated from Birmah, west of 230 miles, by the bay of Bengal; the bay of Bengal is, who have here a military force, and a civil establishment. The inhabitants are Mohammedans, Hindoos, and Mugs, with a few Portuguese, amounting in all to about 1,200,000. The Mugs fled from the tyranny of the Birman government.

They resemble the Birman in language and manners; have no caste; and are intelligent, frank, and kind. They occupy the country south of Chittagong, for about 100 miles, to Ramee.

Chittagong or Istambod: a town and capital of the district of the same name, on the river Chittagong, about 12 miles from the bay of Bengal. E. lon. 91° 45' N. lat. 22° 20'. Two divisions of the town are occupied by Portuguese Catholics, who have two chapels, but are very ignorant. The proportion of Mohammedans is large, and their mosques are numerous, while the Hindu temples are few.

The Rev. Mr. De Bruyn, of the Baptist M. S., commenced laboring here in 1812, with very encouraging success, especially among the Mugs. The great enemy of souls, however, beheld with an evil eye these attempts to rescue from his grasp those over whom he had long tyrannized without opposition, and meditated a blow in a way little expected. A young man whom Mr. De Bruyn had taken into his house, and treated as a son, being reproved by him for improper conduct with more severity than usual, Satan so inflamed the passions of this headstrong youth, that, seizing a knife, he plunged it into the side of his benefactor and friend, who, after languishing a day and a night, expired; not, however, before he had written to the judge of the court, excusing the rash deed of his murderer, and entreating that he might not be punished. Although the infant church suffered so great a loss, it was not left entirely destitute. A young man, named Renciro, who had been among the first baptized by Mr. De Bruyn, exerted himself so far as possible to supply the deficiency, until the arrival of Mr. Peacock, in 1818, who was chiefly employed as superintendent of the schools. In the early part of the year, Mr. Ward, from Serampore, visited Chittagong, and baptized 7 converts, which raised the number of members to 100.

On the death of Mr. Peacock, in 1820, Mr. Johannes, who was educated in the Benevolent institution, proceeded to this station. At this period the church consisted of 150 members, residing in four or five villages. The care of it subsequently devolved on the Rev. Mr. Fink.

The knowledge of the truth is daily spreading at Chittagong. Preaching is maintained in the school-room, at the jail, in the markets and streets. Three natives have been baptized. Many Roman Catholics are searching the Scriptures. In two boys' schools, there are 207 scholars; and in four girls' schools, 129 scholars, all the latter of Mussulman families.

CHITTORE: a town of Hindoos, on the west frontiers of the Carnatic, chief of a strong hill district. It is 52 miles W. by N. Madras; E. lon. 79° 10' N. lat. 13° 15'. 10,000 inhabitants.

The Rev. Mr. and Mrs. Jennings, appointed by the L. M. S., have labored at this station. Messrs. Crisp and Taylor engaged to visit this promising field alternately, every 4 months, until the arrival of the missionary.

Mr. Crisp commenced these periodical visits in the early part of 1826, and, during his stay, formed, in compliance with their own request, a number of native Christians belonging to the place (converts from paganism and Mohammedianism) into a Christian church.

The Rev. Henry Harper, the chaplain at this station, (C. M. S.) actively superintended the schools for about three years, till his removal to Hydrabad, and was otherwise instrumental of much good. On the first of June, 1831, Mr. Jennings departed to his eternal rest, universally lamented.

J. E. Nunn is now the missionary at Chittore, with 2 native assistants. Congregations, 75. Scholars, 177. Tracts and portions of Scripture distributed, 3215. Prospects encouraging.

CHOCTAWS: a tribe of Indians, whose country extends from the Tombigbee river on the east to the Mississippi river on the west, and from the Chickasaw country on the north to the settlements of the state of Mississippi on the south. Its entire length is about 150 miles, its breadth about 140 miles. Its population is much less, embracing 7,000-8000 persons. Their territory was formerly much larger. The population is about 20,000. Thirty years ago their number was probably 30,000. They are divided into 2 classes, which embrace the whole tribe. Members of the same class never intermarry, so that the husband and wife always belong to different classes, and the children belong to the class of the mothers. Their traditions are very vague and uncertain. They retain some faint ideas of a superior being, but do not worship him. They are very superstitious. They have no word in their language to denote a spiritual existence. They anciently regarded the sun as a god. They did not acknowledge a superintending providence, offered no sacrifice, engaged in no worship. When the inquiry has been made, "Did you ever think of God?" they answer, "How can we think of him of whom we know nothing?"

Formerly they were belated and occasioned great terror and the loss of many lives. They were generally indolent and much addicted to drunkenness. Rev. E. Cornelius, late secretary of the A. B. C. F. M., visited their nation during the winter and spring of 1817-18, and opened the way for the establishment of a mission. Rev. Cyrus Kingsbury, with Mr. L. S. Williams, who had been engaged in establishing a mission among the Cherokees, arrived at the place since called Elliot, in remote an unbroken forest. They were joined soon by other helpers, and proceeded to erect the necessary buildings, and (though severely afflicted with sickness, and tried in other ways) to open the school with 10 scholars, on the 16th of the next April. The Choctaws manifested much interest in the success of the mission. They also gave in behalf of the nation an annuity due to them from the government of the United States, amounting to $6,000 a year for 16 years, beginning with the year 1821. Other stations were occupied, and schools opened as soon as circumstances would permit; at which the Board have furnished the gratuitous services of 33 men and 33 women, whose average term of labor has been more than 6 years each. Of the men employed, 5 were preachers, 12 school-teachers, 8 farmers, 7 mechanics, 1 physician. Schools have been opened and taught at 13 stations. In 1831, the following statement was furnished.

Stations.	No. of Scholars.	Stations.	No. of Scholars.
Elliot	41	Juzon's	15
Maybew	64	Hebron	37
Greshen	29	Yoknokehaya	28

The last of the Choctaws, who were to be removed at the expense of the United States, departed for their new territory in the fall of 1833. The whole number who have removed is estimated at 15,000. Many still remain in their old country, exposed to severe trials. The missions among the Choctaws west of the Mississippi consist of 5 stations, all near the Red river, or a branch of it, the Little river, and not far from the south-eastern corner of the Arkansas territory.

Mr. Wilson is the missionary of the A. B. B. to the Choctaws on the Arkansas river. The government of the United States are erecting the necessary school-houses. Three high schools and 12 minor schools are to be established in the nation at the expense of government.

On the island of St. Kitts, one of the Caribbean islands, in the West India, 60 miles west of Antigua. It is 19 miles long and 6 broad, with high mountains in the middle, whence rivulets flow. Between the mountains are dreadful rocks, horrid precipices, and thick woods; and in the south-west parts hot sulphureous springs at the foot of them. The produce is chiefly sugar, cotton, ginger, indigo, and the tropical fruits.

The natural strength of the island is such, that a garrison of 2000 effective troops would render it impregnable to a formidable invasion. It was first discovered, in 1493, by Columbus, who gave it his own Christian name.

The first English settlement was formed in 1620. For several years, the aboriginal inhabitants lived on friendly terms with the settlers, and supplied them with provisions, till the planters seized their lands. After a severe conflict, in which many of the Caribbees were inhumanly murdered, they were driven from the island.

It was in the possession of the French and English, alternately, till 1763, when it was permanently restored to Great Britain. The chief towns are Basseterre and Sandy Point. Inhabitants, 20,000, a large proportion of whom are slaves and colored people. The north point lies in W. lon. 62° 47', N. lat. 17° 27'.

The U. B. in Antigua having been repeatedly solicited to extend their missionary labors to this island, Messrs. Birkby and Gotwald were sent thither in June, 1777.

Having hired a house in the town of Basseterre, they commenced preaching to the negroes; but, though these attended in considerable numbers, and the brethren were contented in their undertaking by many of the proprietors, the progress of the gospel was comparatively slow; as, in 1784, seven years from the first establishment of the mission, the number of converts scarcely exceeded 40.

In 1785, the brethren purchased a piece of ground for the establishment of a regular settlement, and the place of worship which they had erected was so numerously attended, that a more spacious church soon became indispensably necessary.

A sacred flame was now kindled in the island, which continued to spread, until, in the course of a few years, the congregation consisted of 2500; and the attendance on public worship was so numerous, that it was only on the week day evenings the hearers could be accommodated within the walls of the church; on the Sabbath, when the negroes were in the habit of coming from various distant plantations, great numbers were obliged to remain in the open air around the building.

In 1792, the town of Basseterre was visited by a dreadful inundation; and a hurricane which raged in the ensuing autumn proved extremely destructive; but, on each of these occasions, the missionaries were mercifully preserved, though their premises sustained considerable injury. The work of the Lord also continued to prosper, and, in the course of a short time, they obtained the privilege of preaching to the negroes on no less than 50 plantations.

The invasion of St. Christopher by a French fleet, which had previously been anticipated, took place on the 5th of March, 1805; when general Balbot fixed his head-quarters in the neighborhood of the missionaries, and stationed a guard of 4 privates and a corporal at the entrance of their burial-ground. A capitulation, however, being agreed upon, the enemy quitted the island, after laying a contribution, burning six vessels, spiking the cannon, and destroying the powder magazine; and the brethren were enabled to resume their labors without further fear of interruption.

In the year 1819 a new settlement, called Bethesda, began to be formed on the Cayon estate; and on the 25th of February, 1821, the church at that place was solemnly consecrated for the celebration of their worship.

In January, 1787, the Rev. Dr. Coke, accompanied by the Rev. Messrs. Baxter, Clarke, and Hammett, of the W. S., visited this island.

"In February, 1799," says Dr. Coke, "I again visited St. Christopher, and had the satisfaction of being personally convinced of the great benefits which had resulted from the introduction of the gospel into this island."

From this period the mission continued to flourish, under the superintendance of those ministers who from time to time visited the island, on the itinerating plan adopted in the Wesleyan connexion.

In the spring of 1802, the members in the society at St. Christopher amounted to 2587, and a great blessing appeared to rest on the general affairs of the mission.

From this period we have no historical documents relative to the state of the mission in St. Christopher till the year 1816, when Messrs. Whitworth, Kaly, and Whitehouse observe,—"The fall of the year in this, and in many of the islands, has been sickly; but we feel pleasure in stating, that though many of the members of our societies have fallen victims to death, yet, in their last moments, they witnessed a true confession."

"In September, 1819," says Mr. Gilgras, "the inhabitants of this island were dreadfully alarmed by a hurricane. Since the hurricane there has been very little trade, or work of any kind, for free people, and every article of food has become very dear indeed."

On Sunday, January 1st, 1825, Wesley chapel, belonging to the society, from whose founder it takes its name, was dedicated to the solemnities of religion, before a very crowded and attentive congregation, at which were many persons of the first distinction.

CHRISTIANBURG; a Danish fort on the Gold coast, Africa.

CHUMERIAH; a station of the A. B. C. M. in Birmah. Miss Sarah Cummings, missionary; 2 native assistants. This is a principal station among the Karens, three days' journey up the Salween, north of Mauthia. Miss Cummings repaired to this spot in April, 1833. There had previously been a boarding-school of about 12 scholars. A spirit of inquiry is extending around.

CHUMIE; a mission station, in South Africa, among the Caffres, situated on the Chumie river, in the midst of a fertile and populous country. The village is laid out on a regular plan, to which all the Caffres submit who build on the premises.

In 1821, the Rev. J. Brownlee and W. R. Thompson, missionaries, and Mr. John Benoit, assistant, commenced laboring here. The colonial government supports the two missionaries, and the Gleaner Missionary society the assistant. This mission was commenced in compliance with the earnest solicitation of Gaika, one of the principal chiefs of the Caffres, for a Christian instructor, and one to teach him and his people the most useful arts of civilized life. A small congregation of attentive worshippers has been collected, and of the piety of many hope is indulged. The missionaries are extensively gaining influence with the Caffres, and the way is rapidly preparing for the introduction of the gospel and the arts of civilized life. Mr. Brownlee has lately removed to Tzatzoe's kraal.

No late intelligence has been received from Chumie.

CHUNAR, or CHENABOUR; a town and fortress of Hindostan, in Allahabad, chief of the district of Allahabad, fertile to the north and mountainous to the south. The fort, built on a rock, was unsuccessfully attempted by the British in 1764; but in 1772, it was ceded to them by the nabob of Oude. It is seated on the right bank of the Ganges, 15 miles S. W. of Benares, and 63 E. S. E. Allahabad.

Mr. William Bowley, a young man born in the country, and connected with the W. M. S., was settled at this place in 1816. From the time of his arrival, he was almost entirely occupied in forming and superintending schools for the natives. To one central school he attached others in the surrounding villages, at convenient distances, so as to admit of stated or occasional visitation. He also conducted the assemblies of native Christians.

A convenient spot of ground for the erection of a church having been fixed on, the owner being requested to dispose of it, generously offered it as a gift, for the purpose intended; and the marquis of Hastings was pleased to aid the collection by the very liberal donation of 1000 sicca rupees. In the following year, Mr. Bowley wishing to superintend the press, visited Calcutta, and was there solemnly set apart to the sacred ministry, by the imposition of hands, according to the usage of the German Lutheran church. Mr. Greenwood regularly officiated at Chunar twice on Sundays, and on Wednesday evenings to the European inhabitants of the station. The schools also were prospering, and new ones were opened.

In 1824, Mr. Bowley's important Hindewee Testament (altered from Martyn's) was completed.

The bishop of Calcutta, accompanied by the archdeacon, passed Sunday, September 12th, 1825, at this station, of which the latter gives the following account:—

"At Chunar, I may say, we beheld more than had been previously told us. On Saturday morning, 57 of Mr. Bowley's congregation were added to confirmation, together with nearly the same number of Europeans. Next day, a still greater number of native Christians communicated, together with a large number of Europeans. Several gentlemen came from Benares, and some officers from Sultampore. The whole had the appearance of a jubilee; and the fine church, which the bishop calls handsome and appropriate, was entirely filled."

Mr. Bowley has been joined by Mr. J. Landeman, a country-born person, licensed by his superior by the Calcutta committee, on the 15th of December, 1826. On the 17th of February, 1827, he opened one of the schools, which is in the bazaar, for public worship, for the special benefit of the heathen, intending to hold Hindostanee service there twice a week, in addition to the services in the church; about 50 were present. The novelty soon attracted great crowds, especially of the higher class of the natives; and a subscription was, in consequence, opened for the erection of a chapel and school-house in the city. Several of the natives appear to have already felt the power of the gospel: 8 adults received baptism in the course of a few months; of these, 3 were devotees, 2 of whom were deeply learned in all that belongs to the Hindoo system.

Mr. Bowley continues (1833) to itinerate throughout the vicinity of Chunar as in former years. No return of schools has appeared; 3,900 tracts have been printed. The native Christian congregation appears well.

CLAN WILLIAM; a town in Cape Colony, South Africa, about 250 miles north Cape Town. This is one of the stations of the Rhenish Missionary society, 6 miles from Wupperthal, the head-quarters of the mission.

CLEAR CREEK; a station of the A. B. C. F. M. among the Choctaw west of the Mississippi. Ebenezer Hotckin, teacher, his wife, and Anna Burnham, No church.

COCHIN; a province on the west coast of Southern Hindostan, lying between those of Malabar and Travancore, 80 miles long and 70 broad. Nearly one-third of this province is attached to that of Malabar. The remainder, which contains extensive forests of teak, is governed by a rajah, who is tributary to the British, and generally resides at Tripunary.

The white and black Jews, who had 7 synagogues, were estimated, by Dr. Buchanan, at 16,000. The Dutch inhabitants, who are numerous, were formerly Christian in their religion, but they have, generally, relapsed into idolatry or Mohammedanism, or become Roman Catholics, for want of protestant instruction. The native and country-born Portuguese population is very large.

Cochin; a sea-port of the above province, situate on a low island, formed by five bays, which a little below, enters into the sea. Here, in 1503, the Portuguese erected a fort, which was the first possessed by them in India. In 1663, it was taken by the Dutch; and taken from them in 1795, by the British, to whom it was ceded in 1814. The traffic of this place is considerable, and the chief exports are pepper, cardamoms, teak, sandal-wood, cocoa-nuts, coir cordage, and cassia. It is 97 miles S. E. of Calcutta. E. lon. 76° 17'; N. lat. 9° 57'.

The inhabitants of Cochin are now estimated at 300 Protestants, 10,000 papists, 1000 Jews, 2000 Mohammedans, and 6000 Hindoos. Samuel Ridsdale and Stephen Lima, missionaries, with many native assistants; 90 communicants; 233 scholars; besides seminaries in Cochin for males and females.

CODRINGTON COLLEGE; an institution in the island Barbadoes, under the care of the Gospel Propagation society. It was laid in ruins by the recent hurricane which desolated that island.

COHLADI; a village in the Madras presidency, East Indies, where the C. M. S. have a school.

COIMBATORE, 90 miles south-west of Salem, and 100 south of Seringapatam. Mission commenced by the L. M. S. in 1830. W. B. Addis, missionary; 2 native readers. Much encouragement in preaching the gospel. Congregations, 50. First convert baptized in March, 1832.

COLOMANIKEN; a village in the province of Tanjore.

COLOMBO; the capital of Ceylon. It was built in 1638, by the Portuguese, who, in 1656, were expelled by the Dutch; and the latter surrendered it to the British in 1796. The fort, upwards of a mile in circuit, stands on the extremity of a peninsula, and is strong both by nature and art. The city is built more in the European style than any other garrison in India, and is nearly divided into four equal quarters by two principal streets, to which smaller ones run parallel, with connecting lanes between them. The Pettah, or Black Town, without the walls of the city, is very extensive; and in the street next the sea is an excellent fish market. On the rivers in the vicinity of Colombo there are about 300 flat-bottomed boats moored, with entire families on board, who have no other dwellings. The inhabitants amount to above 59,000, and Colombo is the chief place for the staple trade of the island, and is situated in a rich district on the west coast, toward the south part of the island, 65 miles W. S. W. of Kandy. E. lon. 80° 2' N. lat. 6° 53'.

In the year 1740, the Rev. Messrs. Eller and Nitschman, jun., of the U. B., visited the island of Ceylon. On their arrival at Colombo, 80; they seem, in fact, to be Buddhists in heart, while, for temporal interest, they call themselves Christians. Lamentable ignorance, however, generally prevails among them. Mr. Lambrick, in addition to the establishment of schools, has been exceedingly active in the discharge of his ministry.

The Rev. Joseph Bailey arrived at this station on the 23th of August, 1826, and Mr. and Mrs. Selkirk, on the 1st of September. Inhabitants of Cotta, 4500, in 1833. Samuel Lambrick, James Selkirk, missionaries; W. Ridsdale, printer. Mr. Bailey is on a visit home. Printed at this station in 1832, 21,000 portions of Scripture, 1500 school books, and 45,000 tracts.

COTTAYAM, or COTYM; a village on the Malabar coast, Hindostan, about 15 miles from Allepey. Including a small circuit, it contains about 1000 houses, and is in the midst of a very populous country. The labors of the missionaries here are principally devoted to the spiritual good of the Syrian Christians on this coast, of whom it is necessary to promise some account.

The Syrian Christians, otherwise called St. Thomas's Christians, inhabit the interior of Malabar and Travancore, in the S. W. part of Hindostan. They extend from north to south 150 or 200 miles, and in breadth 40 or 50. Between 50 and 60 churches belong to this ancient branch of the Christian church, which has preserved the Syriac Scriptures, in manuscript, from Christ and the apostles; and, unconnected with the rest of the Christian world, has stood for ages, amidst the darkest scenes of idolatry and superstition. The tradition among them is, that the gospel was planted in Hindostan by the apostle Thomas, Landivar at Cranganore, or Chenganore, from Aden, in Arabia, he was well received by Masius, king of the country, whose son, Zusun, he baptized, and afterwards ordained deacon. After continuing some time at Cranganore, he visited the coast of Coromandel, and preached the gospel at Metapur, and finally at St. Thomas's Mount, near Malabar, where he was put to death. His tomb long remained an object of veneration. Dr. Buchanan entertained a decided opinion, that he was good authority to believe that the apostle Thomas died in India, as that the apostle Peter died in Rome.

That Christians existed in India in the second century is a fact fully attested. The bishop of India was present and signed his name at the council of Nice, 325. The apostle St. Frumentus was consecrated to that office by Athanasius of Alexandria, and remained many churches in India. In the fifth century, a Christian bishop, from Antioch, accompanied by a small colony of Syrians, emigrated to India, and settled on the coast of Malabar. The Syrian Christians enjoyed a succession of bishops, appointed by the patriarch of Antioch, from the beginning of the third century, till they were invaded by the Portuguese. They still retain the liturgy, and records on which they could lay their claim in their public worship the language spoken by our Saviour in the streets of Jerusalem. The first notices of this people in modern times are found in the Portuguese histories. In 1503, there were upwards of 100 Christian churches on the coast of Malabar. As soon as the Portuguese were able, they compelled the churches nearest the coast to acknowledge the supremacy of the pope; and 1599 they burnt all the Syriac and Chaldaic books and records on which they could lay their hands. The churches which were thus subdued are called the Syro-Roman Christians, and, with the converts from other tribes, form a population of nearly 150,000. Those in the interior would not submit to Rome; but, after a show of union for a time, fled to the mountains in 1653, hid their books, and put themselves under the protection of the native princes, by whom they have been kept in a state of depression. These are called the Syriac Christians. About 10,000 persons, with 53 churches, separated from the Catholics; but in consequence of the corrupt doctrines and licentious manners of their associates, many have fallen from their former state, and very few traces of the high character which they once possessed can now be discovered.

With regard to the actual number of these people, it is difficult to arrive at any exact conclusion. It appears, however, not probable, as well from the reason of the case as from the accounts of Anquetil de Percon, and others, that they were a much more numerous body of people in former times than they are at present. They now themselves reckon up 89 churches belonging to their body, of which 55 have maintained their independence of the Roman pontiff. According to the most accurate estimate that can be formed, the number of families belonging to these 55 churches amounts, at the lowest computation, to 13,000; the majority of these are poor, and support themselves by daily labor; others employ themselves in merchandise and agriculture. Though many among them are most highly respectable, especially those of the class termed Tarragan, yet there are none who can justly be styled men of property; there are very few indeed among them who possessed of property to the amount of 5000 rупees.

The number of officiating priests, commonly called catanars, is 141. These are wholly supported by the offerings of the laity, on festival days, and on the administration of the occasional rites of the church, with for the most part afford but a very scanty support; and in very few instances do the monthly offerings received by a catanar exceed 5 rупees. They are generally of the best families, and consequently upon their character, as to morals and information, depends, in a great degree, that of the districts in which they reside.

The Syrian Christians are, in themselves, awfully sunk and degraded. The total disregard of the Sabbath, the profanation of the name of God, drunkenness, and, to a considerable extent, especially among the priesthood, adultery, are very prevalent among them.

In 1806, this people was visited by the late Dr. Buchanan, who presented their case to the public, in his Christian Researches, since which much has been done to meliorate their condition. He commenced a translation of the New Testament into the Syrian language, which has been completed and published since his death, and copies sent to each of the churches.

Some account of other means adopted for their welfare remains to be given.

Colonel Munro, the company's resident in Travancore, having erected a college at Cotyam, for the education of the Syrian priests, wished to place an English clergyman on the spot. Accordingly the Rev. Benjamin Baile, proceeded with Mrs. Bailey, overland to Travancore, and they were fixed at Cotyam about the beginning of 1817. All the measures planned by colonel Munro were cordially approved by the Syrian clergy, and aided by them, so far as it had been practicable, to carry the arrangements for their accomplishment into effect. For the translation of the Syrian Scriptures and liturgy into Malayalin, the vernacular language of the country, a number of learned catanars were assembled by the metran; and at this period they had advanced in their labors as far as the first book of Samuel in the Old Testament, besides the books of Psalms, Proverbs, and that part of Isaiah; and in the New, to the epistle to the Philippians. The execution of this work was superintended by the Rev. Mr. Bailey, and the expense of it was borne by the Calcutta Auxiliary B. S. The college also was committed to the charge of Mr Bailey, for whom a house was erected adjoining that institution.

In the course of 1818, her highness the rannee of Travancore presented the college with 20,000 rupees, which were laid out into land; besides a previous gift of 1000 rupees, for erecting a chapel, and furnishing the buildings of the college. She also annexed to it a tract of land in the neighborhood of Quilon, at least 7 miles in circumference, with several subsidiary grants, in order to render it productive; and, lastly, appointed a monthly allowance of 70 rupees from the state, for the support of a hospital, to be attached to the college. The rajah of Cochin, also, emulous of her highness's bounty, presented 5000 rupees for the benefit of the Protestant missions; the whole of which was appropriated by the resident to the support of the southern mission, under the Rev. Mr. Mead, of the L. M. S.

The next two or three years the missionary work was prosecuted with energy and effect. The translation of the Scriptures proceeded in the Malayalin, and preparation was made for printing them. Hopes were of any thing better, at least for a long time to come, Mr. Bailey, without ever having seen a type foundry, or its apparatus of any kind, and eager to get some portion of the Scriptures and some other works respectively printed, as soon as possible, set himself to endeavor to form his own type foundry, such as he could find from books alone, and from common workmen. He had recourse chiefly to the Encyclopaedia Britannica; and, with the instructions which he derived from this and another smaller work or two, a common carpenter, and two silversmiths, he succeeded so completely that he sent a specimen of his types, in print, to the resident, who much admired their beauty and correctness, and complimented Mr. Bailey on his success. Mr. Bailey could not resist the temptation to prepare a sufficiency of types for the printing of the whole Scriptures, in little more than a quarter of a year. Besides the correctness and beauty of his types, noticed by colonel Newall, he afterwards so reduced them in size, that they could be printed at one-half of the cost of the old types.

A permanent reduction in the expense of printing also took place, involving another interesting circumstance in connexion with Mr. Bailey. The printer sent from Madras was dismissed. In the mean time, a youth, adopted some years ago by Mr. Bailey, as a destitute orphan child, had acquired the art of printing sufficiently to succeed as a common printer, to which office he was appointed on a salary of 7 rupees per month. This little incident added singularly to the completeness of Mr. Bailey's work in the edition of the Malayalin Scriptures. The translation was entirely his own; the types were formed by himself from the very mould; and the printing was executed by an orphan boy, reared up by his charity.

About this time Mar Athanasius, a metropolitan from Antioch, paid a visit to the Syrian churches. At the time of his arrival, the retired metropolitan, Philoxenus, had resumed his pastoral cares, in consequence of the death of Dionysius, who had succeeded him: the Malpan Philip had then appointed successor to Dionysius; but the return of Philoxenus to his labor, for a time at least, was thought necessary. Over these metropolitans, and the whole of the Syrian church, Athanasius assumed uncontrolled authority, as having been deputed by the patriarch of the mother church at Antioch, and commenced a series of violent measures. He endeavored to persuade the catanars to renounce their allegiance to their metrans; denied the validity of the metrans' title, and the orders which they had conferred; insisted, if he were acknowledged, on their being stripped of their robes, and resigning their cross and pastoral staff; and excited such a tumult by his proceedings, as compelled the resident, colonel Newall, to remove him from the country.

This event has, as might have been expected, in some degree affected the interests of the mission; but from recent accounts its effects gradually subsided.

At Cotyayam are stationed Peter Fjellstad and Joseph Fee; several native clergymen, and many lay assistants. Mr. Barker and his family are on a visit to England. No report of recent proceedings at Cotyayam has appeared.

CRABOCK RIVER; a river in South Africa, on the banks of which is the missionary station Philipolis.

CREEK PATI; a missionary station on the banks of that river, under the American Methodists, 20 miles west of York, Upper Canada, where the Missisagauw Indians reside. Twenty comfortable houses were built for them by the provincial government. With the exception of 2 chiefs, the whole of the tribe have embraced Christianity, (including 2 chiefs,) to the number of 130; of whom 110 are members of the church.

CREEK PATI; a town of the Cherokee nation, on the south side of the Tennessee river, in Alabama, about 100 miles W. S. W. of Brainerd.

At this place is a station of the A. D. C. F. M. It was commenced in 1820, by the Rev. William Potter. A church was organized in 1823 by Mr. Mrs. Foster, with Miss Erminia Nash, as employed as missionaries and teachers. In 1831, unusual seriousness prevailed at this station, and six were added to the church.

CREEKS, or MUCOGEEES; Indians in the western part of Georgia and the eastern part of Alabama. The number of warriors is about 6000, and of souls above 20,000. They suffered severely in 1813 and 1814, in the war with the United States. They are the most warlike tribe east of the Mississippi. Some of their towns contain from 150 to 200 houses.

In 1823, the American Baptist board established a mission among the Creeks. The station was named WASHINGTON. In 1827, a portion of the Creeks, to the number of between 5300 and 3000, emigrated over the Mississippi river to a place near the junction of the Arkansas and Verdigris rivers. John Davis, a native Creek, who was among the converts at Withington, has devoted himself to labors for the benefit of his countrymen west of the Mississippi.

Mr. Lewis is a missionary of the A. B. C. to the Creeks, assisted by John Davis and his wife. The station called Ebenezer is not far from the limits of the Arkansas territory, in the vicinity of cantonment Gibson. Communicants, 80. Scholars, 30. The spirit of the Lord has accompanied the labors of his servants.

That part of the tribes which has removed west of the Mississippi have come within the sphere of the efforts of the missionaries of the A. B. C. M. who are stationed among the Osagees. Rev. Mr. Wall, one of the missionaries, thus speaks of them, under date of January 10, 1831.

"They are settled quite compactly, extending twelve or fifteen miles up the Arkansas and Verdigris rivers. The country intervening is one continued village, as thickly settled as some of the smaller parishes in New England, having some neighborhoods more dense than others. The people are strictly agricultural, and in many parts just as near to each other as their farms will admit. In almost any part of the settlement fifty children may be collected within a circle whose circumference is two miles from a given centre. The country assigned to the Creeks is not yet marked off definitely; but the settlement which has been begun, it is hoped, will be permanent and growing.

The mass of the people are desirous of a school. This is evident from the repeated applications to take their children to the school at Union. Had we taken all that have been offered, we should have had a very large school at this time. Probably no children in any nation ever learned more rapidly than the Creek boys and girls under our care.

The A. B. C. F. M. have established a mission to the Creeks. John Fleming, missionary, and his wife. It is reported that about 5000 Seminoles from Florida are soon to join this portion of the Creek nation. Eight or ten thousand still reside in Alabama. Mr. Fleming has prepared an elementary book of 101 pages for the Creeks. He also preaches stately on the Sabbath. Dr. R. L. Dodge, a physician, is on his way to this mission.

CROCKETT SPRING, a station of the B. M. S. on the island Jamaica, West Indies. W. W. Cutlow, missionary. Communicants, 614; 324 converts, 101 added to the school in 1830-1. There is a large number of native teachers and exhorters.

CUDDALORE; a town in the Carnatic, Hindostan, near the fort of St. David. E. lon. 79° 46', N. lat. 11° 41'.

Two missionaries from the C. K. S. were stationed here in 1737, who labored many years with much success, and were useful to the natives in the faith. In 1719, they had a congregation of 311 members.

Rev. David Rosen, of the G. P. S., accepted an appointment in 1831, under the Danish government at Tranquebar, to the station at Cuddalore. He has extended his services to Pondicherry. The native Christian families in connexion with Cuddalore are 31; communicants, 78.

CUDDAPAH; the capital of a district of the same name, in Golconda, Hindustan, which is said to contain 60,000 inhabitants. E. lon. 24° N. lat. 14° 25'.

To this place Mr. Howell, late superintendent of the native schools in connexion with the Bellary mission, under the patronage of the L. M. S., removed in November, 1832. At the request of T. Lascelles, Esq. registrar of the Zillah court, he took charge of two native schools, previously established by that gentleman; and having united them, he opened a native day school, which was also established, and schools were opened at the following villages, situated within a distance of ten miles from Cuddapah, viz.—Sharpey, Ootour, Chinmar, and Guagayally. This aggregate number of native children in the several schools, into all of which Christian instruction was introduced, was about 151, and their progress was very encouraging. Besides these engagements, Mr. Howell preached in the school-room to a congregation of natives, fluctuating between 10 and 50; translated the catechism used at Chitnurah and Bellary into Telugu; examined the Canara version of the Old Testament; and distributed numerous copies of the Telugu New Testament.

Mr. Howell is still at Cuddapah, with James Trott, assistant, and five native assistants. The communicants, 20 in number, adorn their Christian profession. Scholars, 155; 2,000 tracts and 500 portions of Scripture were distributed in one journey. In one village, 61 persons have been baptized.

CULNA; a town on the west bank of the Hoogly, 47 miles north of Calcutta. This place has lately called forth the efforts and liberality of the C. M. S.

From the spot where the society's premises are, a continued range of hills extends four miles south-easterly, on the western bank of the head of the river, down to Goalpohar, below Serampore, on the eastern side; and there is an equal range for four miles easterly towards Burdwan. The inhabitants form, according to the account of the natives, 15 or 20,000 houses or families; if only five persons are supposed to be in one family, the number would amount to 80 or 100,000 souls. The inhabitants opposite Culna, straight across the river, in Santipore, are stated by the natives as forming not less than 20 or 22,000 families.

in this region," says the missionary, "a considerable part of the population are Brahmans; but the general occupation of the bulk of the people is in different branches of trade and employments in offices; in agriculture not many are engaged. The place properly called Culna is chiefly inhabited by those who come from different parts of the country to carry on their trade here: this may be a reason why the people there have not the simplicity which villagers generally have, but are more deceitful; and yet they have not so much of the liberty which people in other towns possess, where they care but little for one another. I have also formerly observed, that the people who often came from that quarter were very obstinate idolaters; and even now, idolatry is carried on there with far greater force than it is in Burdwan."

At Culna, in 1833, a Mussulman and young woman have been baptized. In an English school from 30 to 38 youths attend daily; and in four other schools there are 300 scholars, of whom 97 are reading the gospel.

CUTTACK; a district in Orissa, Hindostan, between 20° and 22° N. lat., 140 miles long and 60 broad, containing about 1,200,000 inhabitants. The temple of Juggeroat is about 40 miles distant. The influence of the gospel has greatly lessened the number of attendants. Missionaries have taken advantage of the favorable opportunity afforded for the distribution of tracts. At a late festival, those of the B. M. S. distributed about 100 pamphlets in the Bengalee language.

Cuttack, a fortified town, and capital of the district of the same name, 250 miles S. W. of Calcutta, is calculated to contain 5741 houses. Every foot of it is esteemed high ground, and the whole of the land is held free of rent, on the tenure of performing certain services in and about the temple.

The Rev. Messrs. Bampton, Perez, and Lacey, from the General B. M. S., arrived here in 1822. The study of the language at first chiefly occupied their attention: from its affinity to Bengalee, of which they had acquired some knowledge, they were soon able to make excursions among the natives, and to hold intercourse with inquirers, who would sometimes visit them from a distance of twenty miles. English preaching was begun on Sunday mornings and evenings, for the benefit of the European residents; few, however, attended. A monthly missionary prayer meeting was established; and, in six schools, the missionaries collected 120 scholars.

G. Lacey, W. Brown, and three native assistants are now employed at Cuttack. More than 20 adults have been baptized. The native communicants with their families now form a goodly number. To the English charity school, 1739 rupees were contributed in the year. The children, about 45 in number, decidedly improve. A great number of tracts have been distributed.

CUTTAWA; a town on the western banks of the river Hoogly, in the province of Bengal, district of Burdwan, 75 miles N. of Calcutta. At the period when the Mahabrats were contending with the Mussulmans, it was once the scene of "confused noise, and of garments rolled in blood;" and it still retains many signs of ancient warfare. The Rev. John Chamberlain, of the G. P. S., entered this new field of effort in 1821, and labored in it and its neighborhood most indefatigably and zealously. Two years after, he wrote—"But little success attends the work in this place; yet, blessed be God! I am not without hope, nor without some encouragement. Kankalee and his wife, who have been baptized, are a comfort to me, and in him we daily see the triumph of truth. He was once an idle, religious beggar; but since he has been from among his idols to the living and true God, he labors cheerfully with his own hands to provide things honest in the sight of all men. Three others, who live at a distance, give us hope. People are often coming to hear; and when they seem attentive, nothing so gladdens my heart as to tell them of the love of our Savior."

Another circumstance ought not to be omitted.—A Hindu, named Brijdabhan, had been also for many years a religious mendicant. His hair had been shaved, and he was almost blind from contact with his eyes, and he had indulged in smoking to such an excess as nearly to deprive himself of sight. He first heard the gospel at a large fair between Cutwa and Burhanpore. He was observed to pay great attention the whole day; and was seen sometimes to laugh, and at other times to weep. At night, he came to Mr. Chamberlain, and said, in allusion to the custom among the natives of presenting flowers, "I have a flower (meaning his heart) which I wish to give to some one who is worthy of it. I have, for many years, travelled about the country to find such a person, but in vain. I have been to Juggernaut, but there I saw only a piece of wood; that was not worthy of it; but to-day I have found one that is, and he shall have it—Jesus Christ is worthy of my flower."

His subsequent conduct proved his sincerity. He learned to read; from being an idle devotee, he became an industrious old man; and was, for some years, a most devout, judicious, and indefatigable preacher of the gospel.

All the fairs in the vicinity of Cutwa have been visited. Tracts and the Scriptures have been largely distributed. Numbers have inquired about salvation. The children in four female schools make satisfactory progress.

D.

DACCRA; the richest district in Bengal, 180 miles long and 60 broad. Dacca, or Scelopore; the capital of Dacca, situated on a branch of the Ganges, N. E. of Calcutta, 170 miles travelling distance, containing 398,000 inhabitants, of whom more than half are Mohammedans, and a fourth are Armenians and Greek Christians. E. lon. 90° 17', N. lat. 23° 45'.

The Rev. O. Leonard, from the B. M. S., accompanied by a native, arrived in 1816. In 1822, there were 1300 pupils in 17 Bengalee schools, into most of which the Scriptures were introduced without exciting alarm. A school for indigent Christian children in the city formed many into valuable members of society, who would otherwise have been wandering about in vice and wretchedness.

The hands of Mr. Leonard were strengthened by the accession of Mr. D'Cruid, from Serampore. Mrs. Peacock, the widow of a missionary, also went to Dacca to take charge of the female schools. Several interviews were held by the missionaries with the Sattas Geroes, a singular sect of Hindus, who have renounced idols and professed to approve Christianity, of which, through the medium of the Scriptures in their own language, they have acquired considerable knowledge. While these excited some hopes, Mr. Leonard was encouraged in his assertions for the young, by pleasing evidence that two of his pupils died in the faith of Christ.

The mission at Dacca is now connected with the Serampore Baptist. Mr. Philip Paul assists Mr. Leonard. Divine service is held four or five times in the week. Communicants, 11. Seven schools for boys have 61 scholars, and 7 for girls 221.

DARWAR; an outstation of the mission of the L. M. S. at Belgaum. This latter place is 600 miles N. W. from Madras. The mission at Darwar was commenced in 1829. Dhoudpah is a native assistant. Tanul service is held twice a week at Darwar. Congregation, 25 to 30. Communicants, 11. Scholars, 50. Dhoudpah has labored successfully among the prisoners in the jail.

DECCAN, or the country of the South; an extensive country of Hindostan, bounded N. by the Nerbuddah and S. by the Kistnah, extending across the peninsula from sea to sea. In the seventeenth century, this province was annexed to the kingdom of Delhi, and divided into six governments.

DELHI; a province of Hindostan, 240 miles long and 180 broad, bounded on the N. by Lahore, N. E. by Serinagar, S. E. by Oude, S. by Agra, and W. by Ameer. Having been the seat of continual wars during the eighteenth century, it is almost depopulated; and though it possesses, in general, every advantage that can be derived from nature, it is but little cultivated. The principal rivers are the Ganges and Jumna, which enter on the N. E. border. The country having enjoyed a state of tranquillity since 1803, it may be expected to improve in cultivation, &c. From this period, the city of Delhi and its district has, in reality, been subject to the British government; but the people are nominally under the authority of the emperor of Hindostan, and are now all that remains to the great Mogul of his once extensive empire.

Delhi is the capital of the above province. It is the nominal capital of all Hindostan, and was actually so during the greatest part of the time since the Mohammedan conquest. In the time of its splendor, it covered a space of 20 miles, from the appearance of the ruins. The present city is built on the left bank of the Jumna, and is about seven miles in circuit, surrounded on three sides by a wall of brick and stone, in which are seven gates. Caravans arrive annually from Cashmere and Cabool with shawls, fruit, and horses. Precious stones of a good quality are to be had at Delhi. It is 220 miles N. W. Calcutta, E. lon. 77° 5', N. lat. 28° 41'.

The Rev. Mr. Thompson, of the Bapt. M. S., removed from Patna to Delhi, in 1823. Soon after his arrival, disease, which was prevalent in Bengal, began its awful ravages in this imperial city; sweeping away, among the first, four members of the royal family, besides numbers inferior rank. Still more awful, however, were the proofs exhibited of spiritual death. But while the missionary was much discouraged on this account, he distributed a number of gospels among the Afghans, who are supposed to be descended from the twelve tribes of Israel. Some of them, when leaving Delhi, repeatedly solicited Mr. Thompson to accompany them; assuring him that their own countrymen would be very anxious to possess and to search the writings of inspiration.

In 1823, Mr. Thompson was cheered by an event highly gratifying to himself, and which excited a great sensation in this populous city. An aged Brahmin, held in the highest estimation among his neighbors for his attainments in Sanscrit literature, and for his knowledge of the shasters, after hearing the gospel for some time, publicly renounced idolatry; and, notwithstanding all the efforts made both to allure and to terrify him from his purpose, openly professed his faith in Christ, and was baptized by Mr. Thompson in the presence of many spectators. On this occurrence the Serampore brethren observe—"The renunciation of Hindoosim, being in that part of the country quite a new thing, has procured much attention to the doctrine of the gospel. It seems to show, among other things, the safety with which Christianity may be promulgated in the darkest parts of India. All the threatened opposition to the man's profession, and hostility ended in a few expressions of personal dislike from his old acquaintance, on account of the course he had taken, and his having tacitly condemned them and all their religious observances, by nobly daring to follow his own convictions of the truth. For all this, however, he was prepared; and by sustaining the whole in the spirit of genuine Christianity, he in a great measure disarmed the resentment of his neighbors and acquaintance.

Delhi has been for some time connected with the Serampore mission. Inhabitants, between 200 and 300,000. There are 40 Mohammedan mosques. The word continues to be made known at the great fairs, and serious attention is paid by many. More than 10,000 publications, in seven or eight different languages, were distributed in the last two years. There are instances of deep attention in some youth connected with the mission.

DEMERARA, or DEMERARY; a settlement in Guiana, on a river of the same name, contiguous to Essequibo. The river is two miles wide at the mouth, defended by a fort on the east bank, and navigable upwards of 200 miles. The country produces coffee, sugar-canes, and the finest kinds of wood. It was taken from the Dutch by the British in 1795, and in 1803; and it was ceded to them by the Dutch in 1814. This settlement, and that of Essequibo form one government, and the capital is Stabroek.

In December, 1807, the Rev. John Wray was sent hither by the L. M. S., in compliance with the solicitations of Mr. Post, a pious and respectable Dutch planter on the east coast of the colony. He commenced his labors on the plantation of Le Resourvenir, belonging to Mr. Post, who had upon it about 500 slaves, under the most encouraging circumstances. A few weeks after his arrival, he announced the conversion of more than 20 negroes—that upwards of 200 had learned Watts' First Catechism—that he had baptized four adults and several children—and that his congregations were large and attentive. This success increased during the year 1808; so that early in the ensuing spring the number of slaves admitted into the church by baptism amounted to 24, and not less than 150 appeared to be seeking the salvation of their souls. "Now was this all—the truth they had learned they were anxious to communicate to others. 'I am informed,' says Mr. Wray, 'that some, at the distance of twenty miles, who have never seen our chapel, have learned Dr. Watts' First Catechism; and ten of our people, who best understand it, have taken eight each under their care, to instruct them, to watch over their conduct, and to settle disputes among them. The manager of these slaves, who attends our place of worship, is astonished at the change wrought among them. Before they heard the gospel, they were indolent, noisy, and rebellious; but now they are industrious, quiet, and obedient.'"

Mr. Wray subsequently removed to Erbice, amidst expressions of affectionate regard and poignant regret on the part of his people. In December, the Rev. Mr. Elliott, who had for some years labored at Tobago, paid a visit to Demerara, and was highly gratified at witnessing the success of his brethren. "Some thousands," he remarked, "I know that Christ is the Son of God and the Savior of sinners; and I doubt not that some hundreds believe in him to the saving of their souls. For nearly two years, the directors were unable to obtain a resident successor to Mr. Wray, though during that time the chapel was supplied by Mr. Davies, and other missionaries. Mr. Elliott also appears to have labored with equal zeal and success; in the first instance at Georgetown, and afterwards on the west coast, where his services were so abundantly blessed, that a striking improvement was visible in the morals of great numbers; and scarcely a Sabbath elapsed without some offering themselves as candidates for baptism."

Immediately after the arrival of the Rev. John Smith, in 1817, at Le Resourvenir, the attendance was much increased, and in a short time the chapel was found insufficient to accommodate all the people that flocked together. Some of the planters would not suffer their slaves to attend, but others found it most conducive to their own interest to give them permission.

The report into details of these transactions which afterwards occurred, is at present impossible; suffice it to observe, that the report for 1824 states, that Mr. Smith, who, "at the period of the previous anniversary, was peaceably and usefully laboring in the midst of an extensive slave population, by whom he was universally respected and beloved, was, on the 21st of August, 1823, taken into custody; his private journal and other papers seized; and himself and Mrs. Smith lodged in the Colony-house. After a painful imprisonment of seven weeks, during which period he was refused all communication with his friends, Mr. Smith, a minister of the gospel, was summoned before a court-martial, to be tried on a charge of conspiracy against the peace of his majesty's government and for abetting the late disturbance among the slaves of the colony. Being thus made amenable to a military tribunal, he was deprived of those ordinary civil rights and privileges which belonged to him as a British subject. An immense mass of evidence was brought forward by his accusers, which, instead of establishing his guilt, served, on the contrary, to show the general excellence both of his personal and official character. The court, nevertheless, thought proper to find Mr. Smith guilty of death; and he was accordingly sent as a felon to the common gall of the colony. The sentence of the court was referred to his majesty's decision. His majesty was pleased to remit the sentence; but Mr. Smith was required to quit Demerara, and to enter into his recognizance not to reside, in future, in any part of the British West Indies. Before, however, these determinations of his majesty's government reached Demerara, his happy spirit had ascended to that place where "his judgment shall be brought forth as light, and his righteousness as the noonday."

Owing to the changes resulting from the emancipation law, we are not able to state the present condition of the missions in Demerara and in some of the West Indies.

DIGAH; a populous town in Bahar, Hindostan, on the S. bank of the Ganges, near the extensive cantonments at Dinapore, 320 miles N. W. Calcutta.

Two native brethren connected with the Bapt. M. S. were sent hither in the year 1816. In 1816, Mr. Chamberlin visited the station; and says in his journal, dated January 3—"We assembled this evening to hear four natives declare what God had done for their souls. Their declaration was very interesting and encouraging. One of these persons is a native of Bhurtpore, a town beyond Agra. He was on his way so far for Jugunnaht, but here divine mercy shone upon him; he was picked up by the native brethren by the way side. Another is a native of Jopore, which is still further beyond Agra. He was arrested by divine grace on his return from Jugunnaht, by meeting with the brethren Brindaband and Kureem. Two others were Byragges from those parts of the country; one of them was a Goeroo, who had made many disciples. Mr. Chamberlin afterwards sat down with twenty-three persons, nine of whom were natives, at the Lord's supper.

After this, the Rev. Mr. Rowe was appointed to this station, and native schools were opened. The missionaries procured the discharge from the army of a serious young man of the name of Stewart, who assisted Mr. Rowe in his school, and made much progress in the Hindostanee."

In 1823, Mr. Rowe was removed by death. In June, 1831, Mr. John Lawrence and his wife sailed from England, to continue the mission at Digah and the neighboring cantonments of Dinapore.

Pybaho is the native assistant of Mr. Lawrence at Pighah. Communicants, 13. Four boys' schools and one for girls.

DINAGOPPORE; a city of Bengal, capital of a district of the same name, 230 miles N. Calcutta, containing 20,000 inhabitants. At the close of 1805, a new Baptist church was formed here. Several of the members who resided in the neighborhood, with Mr. and Mrs. Bliss, were deputed from the Serampore mission for this purpose, who chose the Rev. Mr. Fernandez for their pastor.

In October, 1826, the Rev. Mr. Mack had an opportunity of visiting Dinapore and Sadanah, (at the latter he had the pleasure of baptizing four young men,) and was greatly delighted with the humble and affectionate deportment, and indeed the whole appearance of the people, who displayed a piety and earnestness to rule them all by love.

Mr. Ignatius Fernandez, a native, who long labored at this place, and who was a most estimable man, entered into his eternal rest in December, 1830.

DINAPORE; a town in Bahar, Hindostan, on the S. bank of the Ganges, 11 miles from W. Patna, for the defence of which an extensive military cantonment has been constructed by the British. E. lon. 85°, N. lat. 25° 25'.

Preaching in the bazar at Dinapore is well attended, and everywhere the poor are ready to hear. S. Barceiro, from the college, assists Mr. Smylie.

Rev. H. Martyn was, for some time, stationed at this place. The missionaries at Dinah now visit it.

DOMINICA: one of the Caribbean islands, which lies about half way between Guadaloupe and Martinico, and is 28 miles long and 13 broad. The soil is thin, but it is well supplied with rivulets, and the sides of the hills bear the finest trees in the West Indies. It was taken by the British in 1761, and confirmed to them in 1763. The French took it in 1778, but restored it in 1783; and in 1795 they made an unsuccessful attempt—for all the Frenchmen that landed, were either killed or taken prisoners. The capital is Charlotte Town.

In the month of December, 1788, the Rev. Dr. Coke, accompanied by a few missionaries, visited Dominica, and met with a very cordial reception from some of the inhabitants, particularly from his excellency governor Orie.

In 1794, Mr. Cook was appointed to take charge of the mission; and he continued to labor with unremitting assiduity till 1796, when another missionary was sent to succeed him. Under the instrumentality of this person, the congregations began to increase both in number and respectability. The preaching of the gospel was evidently productive of real benefit to many individuals; and peace and prosperity appeared likely to be long enjoyed by the society.

After a lapse of about two years, Mr. Dumbleton proceeded to Dominica, where he found the society in a very low state, and the prejudices of the planters by no means removed.

Mr. Dumbleton was succeeded by Mr. Boocock; but this missionary was much debilitated by the effects of an unpleasant passage, and he died but a few days after his arrival. His death plunged the society and congregation into a state of deep distress.

Mr. Shepley arrived at Dominica in February, 1803, and had the satisfaction of recruiting those members of the society who had been scattered whilst destitute of a pastor.

In December, 1803, Mr. John Hawshaw arrived in Dominica; and after spending a few days at Roseau, he went to St. Rupert's Bay, the health of which he procured to himself and to other laborers abundant employment and an untimely grave.

After preaching at this place about a month, with considerable success and much personal satisfaction, he was seized with the same malignant fever which had already proved fatal to Messrs. McCornock and Richardson, and from which Mr. Shepley and Mr. Dumbleton (the latter of whom had some time since returned to Dominica) had escaped with extreme difficulty.

In 1816, Mr. Boothby commenced his labors at Dominica, where he found things in a very discouraging state, there being neither a chapel nor a residence for a minister.

In 1824, Mr. Felvus appears to have been zealously engaged in communicating religious instruction to the negroes in a district of the island called St. Joseph's.

DUM-DUM: a military station, about ten miles N. E. of Calcutta, occupied by the E. I. company's artillery.

The Serampore missionaries have long preached the gospel to the European soldiers here, as circumstances would allow; and have employed a native brother to preach it in Hindostanee and Bengalee to their wives, who, in general, are either natives, or the daughters of European soldiers and native mothers, and therefore speak the native languages. From these labors a church has been raised, of a very pleasing character. Its members are liable to be scattered over all parts of the country; and though this subjects their religious principles to rather a severe trial, yet they are frequently made the means of doing good, and of spreading the knowledge of salvation where it was unknown or unattended to before.

Communicants at Dum-dum, 46. Scholars, from 40 to 70 boys. Southey, native preacher.

DWIGHT: As early as 1804, a part of the Cherokee Indians removed from the country east of the Mississippi river to a region upon the river Arkansas, 4 or 500 miles from its entrance into the Mississippi. In the year 1816 and 1817, another considerable emigration took place. In 1820, the American Board commenced a mission among them at their own request. The place selected for the commencement of operations was named Dwight, in grateful remembrance of the Rev. president Dwight, of Yale college, a distinguished friend of missions. It is on the west side of a creek called Illinois, which empties into the Arkansas from the north, 500 miles from its mouth. The missionaries arrived in the month of July, 1820. Sickness prevented their entering immediately on their work; and, for some time, greatly retarded their operations. Messrs. Jacob Hitchcock and James Orr, assistant missionaries, commenced the undertaking. They were soon joined by the Rev. Messrs. Alfred Finney and Cephas Washburn. The fatigues and sufferings endured by these brethren were very great. Mr. Asa Hitchcock, a schoolmaster, joined them in 1821; and Mr. Samuel Newton, also a schoolmaster, in 1826. Other helpers were connected with the mission, and God granted tokens of his approbation in the conversion of souls to Christ. On the 6th of May, 1828, a new treaty was formed with the government of the United States, by which they exchanged the lands which they occupied for lands lying further west. Their new territory is bounded as follows: E. by a line running from Fort Smith, on the N. side of the Arkansas river, to the S. W. corner of the state of Missouri, thence with the W. boundary of Missouri, till that boundary crosses the waters of the Grand river; north by a line from the last-mentioned point on the Grand river to a point from which a due south line will strike the N. W. corner of the Arkansas territory; west by a line from the point last mentioned, continuing due south on and with the present boundary line of the territory to the main branch of the Arkansas river; south down the main branch of said river to its junction with Canadian river, and thence up and between the Arkansas and Canadian rivers, to a point at which a line running north and south from river to river will include in all 7,600,000 of acres. A perpetual outlet west was also guaranteed to the Cherokee nation, and the use of all the country lying west of the western boundary above described, as far as the new territory of the United States extends. The government also gave to the Indians $50,000 as a compensation for the trouble of removing; and an annuity of $2,000 for three years, $8,760 for apollations made upon them by whites, $500 to George Guess for the benefit conferred upon the Indians by his alphabet, and $2,000 annually to the nation for ten years, to be expended for the purposes of education.

Other grants, made to individual Cherokees, amounted to $3,500. There is no state nor territorial government which claims jurisdiction over the land of these Indians, or beyond them, or which can ever hereafter, if the national government choose to prevent, embosom them. The features of the country west of Arkansas territory and Missouri, with the exception of the lands given to the Cherokees, Choctaws, and Creeks, are such as to offer little inducement to the intrusion of the white man. The country is one wide prairie, broken only by narrow strips of forest land on the water-courses. The missionary station at Dwight fell without the Cherokee country, and in 1828 was removed. In its present location it is on the west side of the Salisa, a branch of the Arkansas, 12 miles from its mouth, and 30 miles east of Fort Gibson. Previously to the arrival of the missionaries, the most common vices were drunkenness, gaming, and lewdness, with its accompaniments, infanticide, conjugal infidelity, and disease. A great reformation was soon accomplished by means of the gospel. In 1828, it was estimated that not so many gallons of ardent spirits were consumed in a year as there were barrels previously to the arrival of the missionaries. The Rev. Alfred Finney died, much lamented, June 10, 1831.

By a letter from Mr. Washburn, of January 2, 1832, it appears that God has continued to pour out the influences of his Holy Spirit, as its fruits it was expected that more than 20 would unite with the church. "I have never known," he remarks, "the religious state of the mission family in all respects so encouraging as at the present time. Our schools are in a very interesting state. In the female school, there are seven over whom we rejoice as the young disciples of the Lord. Several others are deeply serious, and we hope not far from the kingdom of God. Several of the boys are in a state of great concern, and we hope the Holy Spirit is moving upon the hearts of some of our children in the infant school."

In 1834, the mission at Dwight consisted of Cephas Washburn, missionary, James Orr, farmer, Jacob Hitchcock, steward, Asa Hitchcock, teacher, and their wives; Aaron Gray, mechanic, Mrs. Joslyn, Mrs. Lockwood, Ellen Stetson, Cynthia Thrall, and Esther Smith, teachers. At a place near Dwight, 12 or 15 have lately been renewed by the Spirit of God. Scholars, 80. The Christian character of the members is good.

E.

EBONY; a station of the B. M. S., in the island Jamaica, West Indies.

ECHMIADZIN; the seat of the Catholics, or head of the Armenian church, near Erivan, the capital of the Persian Armenia, on mount Ararat. The German missionaries at Shosha have attempted, with but little success, to introduce the gospel to the notice of the corrupt priesthood. Messrs. Smith and Dwight, of the A. B. C. F. M., visited this place in their late tour through Western Asia.

EGINA, or EGINA; a Grecian island in the Saronic gulf, about 300 miles in circumference. In ancient times, it constituted an independent state, and was rich and flourishing by reason of its commerce. On this island is an orphan asylum, in which boys are collected together from all parts of Greece. There is also a central school, connected with which is a preparatory school.

EGYPT; called by the Arabs, Mezz; by the Copts, Khemi; and by the Turks, El Kabil; formerly a mighty empire, the seat of a high civilization, the land of signs and wonders; now a kingdom, scarcely a fifth part inhabited, governed by a pacha or viceroy, appointed originally by the sultan. The present pacha is Mohammed Ali, a man of great ability. Egypt lies in North Africa, between 22° and 32° N. lat., and 27° and 34° E. lon. It is bounded on the N. by the Mediterranean sea, E. by the Red sea and by Arabia, S. by Nubia, W. by Barca and the great desert. It contains about 200,000 square miles, of which only about 17,000 square miles, in the valley of the Nile, (600 miles long, and from 12 to 25 broad,) are susceptible of cultivation. The population is differently estimated at from 2,500,000 to 4,000,000. Geographers divide it into Upper Egypt, or Said, Middle Egypt or Iostani, and Lower Egypt, Bahari, including the fertile Delta. These are again divided into twelve provinces, each of which is governed by a bey, and which, together, contain about 2,500 cities and villages. The simoom,—a hot south wind, the plague, and ophthalmia are prevalent in Egypt. It has but two seasons, spring and summer the latter lasts till April or November.

The people consist of Copts, embracing at most 30,000 families, Arabs, who are most numerous, and are divided into fellahs, or peasants, and Bedouins, the wandering tribes of the deserts; and Turks the ruling people. Besides these are Jews, Greeks, Armenians, &c. The Manelukes have been nearly exterminated. The Egyptian has an active complexion, gay disposition, and is not devoid of capacity. The prevailing religion is Mohammedanism. At Cairo, the capital, resides the patriarch of the Eastern Christians.

Incidental and temporary efforts have been made, for a few years past, by various philanthropic societies, for the benefit of the inhabitants of this country. (See ALEXANDRIA, and CAIRO.) The missionaries of the C. M. S. make the following general remarks in reference to Egypt. "According to the experience we have hitherto had, we foster the prevailing religion, the Mohammedanism, in Egypt, in three different ways, leading to one and the same end. First, by spreading the written word of God, through the assistance of the press at Malta; secondly, by the education of youth; and thirdly, by the preaching of the gospel both publicly and from house to house. These three effective means are open to us; and the Lord who has opened them will mercifully grant his blessing to our proceedings. This he has warranted by his promises, and by the desire which he has put into the friends of his Kingdom to send the word of life also to Egypt. It is our comfort and hope in our labor, that the Lord has given a particular promise for this land, and that many children of God in Europe are praying for us, and for the establishment of his kingdom in Egypt."

Of Egypt, the Rev. W. Kruś, of the C. M. S., writes, "Though several years since, many copies of the Bible were diffused in Egypt, yet there seems to rise an increased desire for it among the people, the more it is promulgated." Messrs. Lieder, Kruś, and Miller continue to labor in Egypt. What will be the influence of the vicery of Egypt on missions, remains to be seen. EINEBO, one of the islands of the Pacific ocean, more commonly called by the natives Morea. It was formerly independent; but having been subjected by the late king, it afforded a seasonable refuge to his son, when expelled from his proper dominions. It is said to be ten miles or more in length from north to south, and about half as much in breadth. It has a very narrow border of low land along its coast, from which the hills rise in all directions, except on the north, where a capacious harbor, called Talu, is sheltered from the prevailing winds, and the land has a gradual ascent to the interior. This harbor is situated in 17° 30' S. and 150° W. of Matawai. In form, Einebo varies greatly from Tahiti, having spacious valleys, and several landlocked harbors on its coast. The lower hills are fertile; but the air is thought less salubrious than that of the greater island.

Several missionaries of the C. M. S. having been driven from Tahiti, commenced an establishment on this island, at Papetoi, 1811.

Pomare showed them much kindness; and, in the summer of the following year, he gladdened their hearts by declaring his entire conviction of the truth of the gospel, his determination to worship Jehovah as the only living and true God, and his desire to make a public profession of his faith by baptism; but notwithstanding many pleasing appearances, he refused to desist from his opinion, and to be instructed until he should be more fully instructed in the truths of revelation.

During the years 1813 and 1814, an abundant blessing was poured out on this station, so that the missionaries could report that no less than fifty of the natives had renounced their idols, and desired to be considered as the worshippers of the Most High.

At the commencement of the year 1815, the congregation was considerably increased by an influx of strangers from other islands, whose earnest desire to receive religious instruction prompted them from time to time to visit this place. The congregation, in general, consisted of about 300, and the number of persons who had requested their names to be written down as professed worshippers of the true God, was increased to upwards of 200; the pupils in the schools, of whom the major part were adults, were about 150. Of those who had desired their names to be inscribed as worshippers of Jehovah, four individuals (one man and three women) died very happy about this time. The priest of Papetoi (the district in which the brethren reside) also embraced Christianity, renounced idolatry, and publicly committed his god to the flames. His example was speedily followed by many of the natives; and not only were the former objects of superstitious worship cast into the fire, but the morais and altars were destroyed; and even the wood of which they were composed was used to dress common food, of which different classes, and both sexes, partook indiscriminately, in direct violation of ancient customs and prohibitions.

On the thirteenth of May, 1815, a general meeting was convened, in imitation of the meetings held in London, when about 2000 of the natives assembled, and agreed to form a Tahitian A. M. S., to aid the parent society in England in sending the gospel to other nations. Mr. Nutt preached on the occasion in this large auditory, who were very attentive; after which the king delivered a sensible and interesting address of considerable length, on the propriety of forming the proposed society. With a view to excite the people to emulation in this good work, he alluded to the formation of similar societies among the Hot-tentots in Africa, and to their contributions of sheep or other property, in places where they had no money. He also reminded them of the labor which they had performed, and the pains they had taken for their false gods, and showed how trifling the offerings they were called upon to make to the true God were, in comparison with those they formerly offered to their idols; observing farther, that even their lives were sacrificed to the god, that was indeed no God, being nothing but a piece of wood or cocoa-nut husk! He then recommended that they should consecrate a little property for the spread of the gospel in other islands, where it was yet unpropagated. He observed, that although they had no money, they might give pigs, arrow-root, cocoa-nut oil, and cotton, to buy money with. "Yet," said he, "let it not be by compulsion, but voluntary. He that desires the word of God to grow where it has been planted, and to be taken to countries miserable as ours was before it came here, will contribute freely and liberally towards promoting its extension. He who is inessable in its call, or ignorant of its benefits, will not exert himself with this view. Let it be said. Let him not be called an illiberal man, neither let the chiefs, his superiors, be angry with him on that account." Such was the substance of the king's speech. When he drew to the close of it, he proposed that all persons present who approved of the plan, and were willing to unite in promoting it, should hold up their right hands. A most interesting sight ensued, when in an instant every hand in the assembly was raised, to signify their readiness to unite in the glorious work of spreading the gospel of Jesus Christ among the unenlightened heathen. Pomare then read the rules of the proposed society; persons were appointed as treasurers and secretaries in the several districts of the island; and the people dispersed apparently highly gratified.

In 1823, a new chapel, of coral rock, was commenced at the station in this island, now called Zoby's Place, Blest Town. A cotton manufactory was also erected.

In the following year, the buildings and various apparatus of the cotton factory were completed. On the 1st of March, Mr. Armitage, its superintendent, received the first supply of native cotton, collected by members of the Tahitian A. S. On the 5th of July, the operation of carding was commenced; and on the 26th of September, that of warping the first web; and on the 30th, the process of weaving. The natives, who were incredulous as to the possibility of producing cloth from cotton, were highly gratified by receiving ocular demonstration of the fact. Since that period, the adult and children's schools have considerably increased as to number, and improved as to diligent application. All the learners are divided into classes, and ranged under proper teachers. Both the schools are now under Mr. Henry's superintendence; Mr. Armitage's engagements, in connexion with the cotton factory, having rendered it necessary that he should relinquish the boys' school at Mra. Henry's school, she having taken the girls' school at Bunnet's Place under her immediate charge.

In 1825-6, the buildings of the South Sea Academy were completed: 17 pupils were received; all, with the exception of the young king Pomare, then about seven years of age, children of the missionaries, for whose benefit the institution was founded. The natives also erected a chapel, which was opened on the 8th of May, 1825.

ELIM, first called Vegelestringskraal; a settlement of the United Brethren on New-year's river, near cape Aiguillas, 10 or 12 hours' ride S. E. from Guadenthal, eight and a half E. from Hemel en Aarde, which last is seven hours S. W. from Guadenthal; the three settlements thus forming the points of a triangle, each being a day's journey, on horseback, from the other. The first adult heathen was baptized here on October 1, 1825. About 200 strangers celebrated the following new-year's festival. In the beginning of February, 1826, the settlement had 70 inhabitants, and the gardens were in a flourishing state: the third crop of beans within eight months was in forwardness, on the same piece of ground. Brother Lutring had greatly improved their mill, which was resorted to from all quarters. He also attends to a daily school for the children of the settlement, and to a Sunday school for those of the Hot-tentots and farmers.

In 1833, there were 184 inhabitants at Elim, and 84 walled houses. Teutsch and Lutring, missionaries. No report.

EMAUS; a station of the U. B. on the island of St. Jan, in the West Indies.

ENONI; a station of the U. B. more than 500 miles east of Cape Town, Cape Colony, South Africa. The mission was commenced in 1818. The rapid improvements soon effected, Mr. H. P. Hallebeck, the missionary, thus describes, in 1821.

"What I felt at the first sight of this village of the Lord, no language is able to describe: I had, indeed, been informed of the changes that had taken place here since I first witnessed its beginnings; but even the lively description given in brother Schmidt's letters presented itself more faintly than I now see them with my own eyes. The wilderness and the impenetrable thicket of 1819 were still present to my imagination. Judge, therefore, of my surprise, when I saw that wilderness transformed into fruitful gardens; that thicket extirpated, and a fine vineyard planted in its place; the lurking places of tigers destroyed, and in their stead the comfortable habitations of men erected. Imagine my heartfelt pleasure, when, on the spot where two years ago we knelt down in the fresh track of an elephant, and offered up our first prayer, I now found a beautiful orange tree, adorned at once with ripe fruit and fragrant blossoms; and when, shortly after my arrival, I was invited to tea under the huge yellow tree, in the shade of which but lately there were no assemblies but those of wild buffaloes, elephants, and other dreaded inhabitants of the desert. You need to say, that every tree and shrub planted at Guadenthal was an ornament, not only to the place, but to the gospel; and you may say, with equal truth, that every tree and thorn-bush which is extirpated here, to make room for more useful plants, is not so much a proof of the strength of the human arm, as of the efficacy of God's holy word; for by its influence the work was accomplished. It is certainly more than I had expected, to find here a piece of ground nearly three times as large as the great garden at Guadenthal, cleared, levelled, and laid out as a garden and vineyard for the missionaries, besides about 40 gardens of the Hot-tentots; and all this done amidst a variety of other needful work, and even in the most distressing times."

Enon has now 450 inhabitants. Genth, Halter, and Horwig, missionaries. The station is in a flourishing condition.

ERZROOM; a town in Armenia, 800 miles east of Constantinople. During the late war between Turkey and Russia, a very considerable part of the population of Erzroom fell into the hands of the Russians. They have uniformly encouraged the Armenian population to migrate to their territories. In consequence, the Armenians, to the number of 15,000 or more, left Erzroom, their school of 600 or 700 scholars was broken up; their numerous shops were shut, and the city is left desolate indeed.

ETIMOLY; a village in the Tinnevally district, Southern India, where the chrysolite has recently been discovered.

EUROPE; the smallest of the great divisions of our globe, but distinguished above all the others by its moral, physical, and political power. It is washed on three sides by the sea, which is called by different names, and belongs either to the Northern Arctic or the Atlantic ocean. It is separated from Asia only by an imaginary line, and from Africa by a narrow strait. It lies wholly in the northern frozen and northern temperate zones, between 10° and 63° E. lon. and 36° and 70° N. lat. Including the islands, which contain 317,000 square miles, the whole extent of Europe amounts to about 3,250,000 square miles, of which Russia composes nearly one-half. The population of Europe is estimated to be 215,000,000, of whom 116,000,000 are Roman Catholics, 49,000,000 Protestants, 42,000,000 of the Greek church, 3,000,000 Mohammedans, 1,600,000 Jews.

Missionary efforts are made in various portions of Europe, in Ireland, in France, Germany, Poland, but principally in Greece.

FAIRFIELD; a station of the U. B. on the island Jamaica. It was commenced as early as 1824. In 1825, the number of persons at Fairfield amounted to 1,047, among whom there were 261 communicants, and 141 baptized members of the church. In 1826, a new church was dedicated. In 1830, Mr. Ellis says, "Our auditories at Fairfield are very numerous, particularly on Sundays; and to many of our hearers the doctrine of Christ crucified, which we preach in simplicity, approves itself as the power of God unto salvation. One hundred and eighty negro couples are living according to the scriptural rule of marriage. Instances of unfaithfulness are becoming more and more rare, and the grace of the gospel is strikingly exemplified."

FAIRFIELD; a station of the A. B. C. F. M., among the Arkansas Cherokees, about 20 miles N. W. from Dwight. At Fairfield, Dr. Palmer, missionary and physician, his wife, and Jerusha Johnson, teacher, are employed. Dr. Palmer has a boarding-school of 60 pupils, which succeeds well.

FAIRFIELD, N.S.W. (See NEW FAIRFIELD.)

FALMOUTH; a station of the B. M. S. in Jamaica, West Indies. William Knibb, missionary; 306 members added in 1830; 2,847 inquirers; 670 members. A number of native teachers.

FEJEE or FIJI ISLANDS. These islands lie between 16° and 19° S. lat. and between 177° and 180° W. lon.

Soon after the return of Mr. Davies, of the L. M. S., to Tahiti, from a visit to the islands of Raiavai, the members of his church were convened for the purpose of considering the propriety of sending out two of their own body, as teachers, to the island of Lagéba, one of the Fiji islands, as the Minerva and Macquarie were on the point of sailing again, in that direction.

It seems that several months before, two strangers from New South Wales came to Tahiti, with the hope of procuring a passage to the Fiji islands. What they had seen while in the colony had given them an unfavorable idea of Christianity; but they acknowledged that the new religion, as they called it, had effected much good at Tahiti. They had several times expressed a wish that teachers might accompany them, on their return home, but that two single men should accompany as suitable place for an experiment the island Lagéba, which is not disturbed by wars, as Takauvoo and Bau, and the other larger islands, are. They also added, that Toiavea, the chief of Lagéba, is a quiet and friendly man.

At the meeting of the church at Papara, to which allusion has been made, the two strangers being present, it was decided, not, in the first instance, to send families, but that two single men should accompany the strangers, as teachers; and provided they were well treated, and a prospect of success presented itself, that one or two families should follow.

Mr. Davies had himself visited the Fiji islands, in the year 1809-10, and had then made some progress in the language. During his short stay there, he wrote down many words and sentences, which, with the assistance of the strangers who were now at Tahiti, he was enabled to revise.

He has also compiled a small spelling-book, &c. in the Fiji language, which has been printed. In this little book, the strangers, before they quitted Tahiti, had made considerable proficiency.

On the 27th of January, the Tahitian teachers, whose names are Hape and Tafeta, were solemnly set apart to their work; and, on the 2d of March, accompanied by the two strangers, sailed in the Minerva, captain Ehril, who was bound to the colony of New South Wales.

Presents were given to the strangers, partly for themselves and partly for the chief of Lagéba.

The Wesleyans have appointed C. Tucker and David Cargill to commence a mission at these islands. The two native teachers left on the Feejee islands by Messrs. Barff and Williams are treated well.

FINLEY; a town in the colony of Liberia, 80 miles S. E. from Monrovia, among the Bassas; 200 settlers.

FORKS OF ILLINOIS; a station of the A. B. C. F. M. among the Cherokees of the Arkansas, 20 miles N. of Dwight. Samuel Newton, teacher and catechist; Mrs. Newton. Public worship is held on the Sabbath. There are eleven church members in this place. A protracted meeting was held in September, 1831, at the close of which the Cherokee Temperance Society held an adjourned meeting; eleven persons from this neighborhood joined it.

FOURAH BAY; a mission station in the colony of Sierra Leone, Western Africa.

There is a Christian institution at Fourah Bay, under the care of John Raban, superintendent, John Warburton, tutor, G. Metzger, assistant. Mr. Haesel, the former teacher, is about to undertake a journey of research among the Timmannes. The progress of the students is satisfactory.

FREETOWN; a sea-port of Guinea, capital of the colony of Sierra Leone. The harbor has three wharfs, and is protected by a battery.

It stands on the south side of the river Sierra Leone, seven miles above its entrance into the Atlantic ocean. W. lon. 12° 56'; N. lat. 8° 37'.

Some missionaries from the W. S. took up their abode here in 1816; and in 1820, so successful were their efforts, that in Freetown and its neighborhood, there were in society upwards of 1,100 persons, almost exclusively blacks and people of color. Some misanderstanding afterwards arose, but the prospect was soon more favorable. A chapel, built by the Maroons at Freetown, was opened, and others at West End, Congo Town, and Portuguese Town, were regularly supplied. The chapel at the latter place was destroyed by a fire, which almost consumed the whole place; but one of stone was subsequently erected. Towards this work, and the rebuilding of the town, many of the Europeans very handsomely subscribed, among whom were the governor and the chief justice. In 1823, a painful dispensation of Providence deprived this mission, in rapid succession, of both its laborers. The society was consequently bereft, for a time, of pastoral care, and of public ordinances. Two heroic men were at length found to give the preference to this post of danger. One of them, Mr. Pigott, wrote:—

"Through the kind providence of God, brother Harte and myself arrived here on Friday, March 19, 1824, after a voyage of five weeks. Never could two missionaries be more joyfully received. The news of our arrival soon spread; and to see the poor blacks running from one house to another to inform their brethren and sisters—lifting up their eyes and hands towards heaven—thanking and praising God, was such a scene as we never witnessed before; and we could not for a moment regret having left home to seek salvation to those of whom it may be said, 'the fields are white already to harvest.' On Saturday, the 20th, I examined the class papers, and met the leaders, and was happy in finding that the society had been wonderfully preserved. On the Sabbaths the leaders have had service in each of our chapels. In the Maroon chapel some one regularly read prayers every Sunday morning; and occasionally one or two of the leaders gave exhortations. The number of members in society is 81, and there are several on trial. We have called upon several gentlemen, and they promised us every assistance." In little more than twelve months, however, Mr. Harte was no more.

Mr. Raban continued the exercise of his ministry till June, 1826, when an attack of dysentery, followed by fever and ague, disabled him from attending to his duties. The usual services at the court-room had, till Mr. Raban's sickness, been regularly performed; and an increased attention had been manifested by the European part of the congregation. Few interruptions had taken place, in the same period, in the services at Gibraltar Town, on Sunday and Wednesday evenings. A small chapel was opened there on the 9th of April; from 50 to 70 persons generally attended, with much devotion; and several adults had been baptized, or were candidates for baptism.

At Michaelmas, Mr. Raban's disorder, though much abated, still prevented him from resuming his active duties. Mr. Metzger, from Wellington, and Mr. Betts, from Regent, had, with some interruptions, kept up the services at the court-house; but those at Gibraltar Town had from necessity been left, except in one instance, to the people themselves. There being no prospect of Mr. Raban's immediate resumption of his labors, it was agreed that Mr. Betts should remove, with the consent of the acting governor, from Regent to Freetown, and be there stationed as a second rector; and that he should visit the mountain villages for the administration of the sacraments. At Christmas, Mr. Betts reports that the number of baptisms during the quarter then ending, had been 23; of these, two were adults, who had previously received instruction, and who, there was good reason to hope, were sincere in their profession of faith.

The venerable Mr. Wilhelm, of Freetown, departed this life on the 25th of April, 1831. G. Fox and John Palmer, assistants, remain. Messrs. Collins and Gillespie, missionaries, have reached Freetown.

FRIEDENSBURG, FRIEDENSFELD, and FRIEDENSTHAL; three stations of the U. B. on the island St. Croix, West Indies. The number of persons under the care of the Brethren is 6,000. For full particulars, see St. Croix.

FULNEE, N.W. (See NEW FULNEE.)

FRIENDLY ISLANDS; a cluster of islands in the South Pacific ocean, of great extent, and upwards of 150 in number; some of which are large, and some lofty, with volcanoes. Lon. 184° 46' to 185° 43' E. Lat. 19° 40' to 20° 30' S. Capt. Cook discovered the islands in 1773. The natives are cannibals. They are supposed to amount to 200,000. The climate is healthy.

A mission was commenced on these islands in 1822, by the W. M. S. The mission at the Friendly islands has been attended with extraordinary results. See, for particulars, the TONOX, HAAEAI, and VAVOU ISLANDS.

G.

GALLE, or POINT DE GALLE; a sea-port on the S. coast of Ceylon, in a rich and beautiful district, with a strong fort and a secure harbor. It is populous, and in point of trade ranks next to Colombo. The chief branch of its traffic consists in the exportation of fish to the continent; but a great part of the products of the island are shipped here for Europe. It is 68 miles S. by E. Colombo, E. lon. 80° 17', N. lat. 6° 23'.

On the arrival of several Wesleyan missionaries at Ceylon, the Rev. Mr. Clough was appointed to this place, where he conducted an English service in the Dutch church every Lord's day; and by joint subscriptions of some of his hearers, a private house in the fort was fitted up for a weekly lecture, and for the purpose of conversing on spiritual subjects with such persons as appeared to be under serious impressions. The infant cause was also essentially benefited by the decided patronage of lord Molesworth; who frequently appeared in company with the missionary on public occasions, and was seldom absent from the cottage where the religious meetings were held. On the European residence effects; and the military were not only induced to attend to the word of God, but several of the private soldiers united in society, and though a few returned to the world, the residue remained steadfast, and some of them died rejoicing in the salvation of Christ.

In 1833, members at Galle, 44; in 11 schools 463 boys and 113 girls, and 73 scholars whose sex is not specified. The mission seems to be in a very flourishing state.

Amalgamated is now connected with Galle. John M. Kenny, missionary; John Antoniez, assistant.

GAMBIA; a river in Western Africa, which rises from the mountains on the borders of the Fouta Jalloo, and flows westerly into the Atlantic. It is navigable about 400 miles. At its mouth is the English settlement Bathurst, where the W. M. S. has a mission.

GEORGIAN or WINDWARD ISLANDS; four islands in the South seas, so called in honor of George IV. of England. Through the influence of missionaries, idolatry has been renounced, Christianity introduced in its stead, and the temporal and moral state of the people has been improved almost beyond any former example.

For a full account of this wonderful change, see TAHITI.

GLOUCESTER; a town of liberated negroes, Sierra Leone, West Africa, situated between Freetown and Regent's Town.

A mission was commenced by the Rev. H. Daring, of the C. M. S., in 1816. In 1823, there were about 50 communicants. In that year, Mr. Daring was lost at sea, as it was supposed, the vessel in which he sailed for England never having been heard from.

GNADENHUTTEN; a former station of the U. B. in Pennsylvania, 20 miles from Bethlehem. The following statement will furnish some account of their sufferings during an Indian war.

In the evening of November 24, 1755, whilst the brethren at the mission-house were sitting at supper, they heard an unusual barking of dogs, followed by the report of a gun. Some of them immediately went to the door, when they perceived, to their unspeakable terror, a party of French Indians, with their muskets pointed towards the house; and in the space of a second they fired, and killed Martin Nitschman on the spot; his wife and some others were wounded, but they precipitately rushed up stairs to the garret, and barricaded the door so firmly with bedsteads, that their savage pursuers found it impossible to force it open.

Resolving, however, not to be disappointed of their prey, the sanguinary monsters set fire to the house, which in a short time was completely enveloped in flames. Two of the brethren had previously effected their escape by jumping out of a back window, and now one of the sisters and a boy saved their lives by leaping from the burning roof. One of the missionaries, Mr. Fabricius, attempted to follow their example, but, being discovered by the Indians, they dispatched him with their hatchets, cut away his scalp, and left him lifeless on the ground. All the others, who had fled to the garret, were burned to death. Mr. Samsam, who on the first alarm had gone out at the back door, had the heart-rending anguish of beholding his wife perish in this dreadful manner. When literally surrounded by the devouring element, this excellent woman was heard to exclaim, in the true spirit of a Christian martyr, "Dear Savior, it is all well!" No less than 11 persons perished on this melancholy occasion, viz. seven missionaries, three of their wives, and a female child only fifteen months old! The heathen savages having completed their work of butchery at the mission-house, set fire to the stables, and thus destroyed all the corn, hay, and cattle. They then retired themselves with a heavy meal and departed. They afterwards returned, however, to burn the town and ravage the plantations; but the whole of the congregation providentially escaped, having fled to the woods as soon as they saw the mission-house in flames, and were apprized by one of the brethren of the tragical catastrophe.

Dreadful and disastrous as were these events, they became the means, in the hand of Divine Providence, of effecting a much more extensive calamity: a determination having been formed that such a carnage should be shortly made in all the Moravian settlements, as had never previously been heard of in North America.

A station was afterwards formed, about a mile from Bethlehem, called Nova; and the numbers soon increased, so as to render it expedient to form another. With this view, the brethren purchased about 1100 acres of land. This tract, which several were repaired, and built a town called Beechquetank. During the war in 1763, the brethren and the Christian Indians were forced to abandon these settlements, and the Indians were taken under the protection of government at Philadelphia. Even in these circumstances, the fury of the mob could scarcely be restrained; for the whites were inveterate against all Indians, however amicable or friendly. After the cessation of hostilities, a settlement was formed on the Susquehanna, and called Friedenshausen, or "Tents of Peace." Here they erected 13 Indian huts, and more than 41 houses in the English style. The settlement was frequented by heathen Indians from all quarters; schools were established, and the preaching of the gospel appeared to be blessed to the conversion of many. The treachery of the Indians, however, in the year 1763, compelled the brethren to abandon this settlement, consisting of 241 persons, (beyond that settlement, and they removed to Gadenhutten, on the Muskingum, on the Ohio. Here they remained, experiencing many vicissitudes, till 1791, when they settled in Upper Canada.

GNADENHUTTEN, or Grace Valley; a station of the U. B., 190 miles E. of Cape Town, South Africa, near Sergeant's river, formerly called Barrinkloof. This mission was begun by the Rev. George Schmidt, in 1737.

On the restoration of the colony to the Dutch, they found a kind friend in the new governor, general Janseus, and one of the missionaries was appointed chaplain to the Hottentot corps which had been raised for its defence; in which situation he was highly approved by the constituted authorities.

In January, 1806, the Cape was once more attacked successfully by a British force; but though the government was transferred into other hands, the missionaries continued to meet with the same favor and protection which had formerly excited their warmest gratitude. Sir David Baird and many English officers and gentlemen visited Gnadenhutten, and in the most condescending and friendly manner; and Lord Caledon, who was appointed governor in 1807, evinced the most friendly disposition towards the brethren, and encouraged them to form a second settlement at a place called Groenkloof or Green Glen, in the high road between Cape Town and Saldanha Bay.

To this spot, Messrs. Schmidt and Kohrhammer removed, with their wives, in March, 1808, and took up their residence in a farm-house, the lease of which had just expired. They then applied to the Hottentot captain of that district, explaining the object they had in view, and requesting him to convene his people, that the word of salvation might be addressed to them. About 100 persons were accordingly assembled; and, after listening with the most profound attention to a solemn and pathetic discourse, several of them agreed to reside in the vicinity of the mission-house, and eighteen lots of ground were immediately measured off for the erection of their huts, and the formation of their gardens. The subsequent labors of the brethren at this new station were evidently very successful.

But whilst they were contemplating the joyful prospects which these indications of the work of God upon the minds of the heathen, a circumstance occurred which threatened to be productive of the most disastrous consequences. One night, the slaves in a district called Hottentot Holland rose in rebellion, to the number of 300, and resolved to set fire to Cape Town, to murder all the European males in the colony, and to reduce the females to slavery. They had actually seized and bound several of their masters, carried off arms, horses, and wagons, and committed a variety of depredations. By the prompt exertions of government, however, this formidable insurrection was crushed, and the ring-leaders of the plot, with many of their deluded adherents, were made prisoners.

In the beginning of December, the inhabitants were suddenly involved in a great and terrible calamity, which overwhelmed a great part of their premises with destructive violence.

"On this occasion," the missionaries observe, "we are much pleased to see such willingness and diligence as are not always met with among the people, and are by no means natural to the Hottentot nation: and when we spoke with them of the damage which had been done to their dwellings, and the loss of their property, they had recourse to the Lord for his mercy, that notwithstanding their great demerits they had been chastised with so much lenity." On the 29th of January, 1817, the governor, lord C. Somerset, accompanied by his two daughters, captain Sheridan, and Dr. Barry, paid a visit to the settlement at Gnadenhutten, and expressed the highest gratification, whilst surveying the various improvements in that district. In the evening, the whole party attended the celebration of divine service in the church, and appeared much pleased with the singing of the Hottentots; and the following day, his excellency and suite visited the school, the smithy, the cutlery, and the joiner's shop; and before they departed, his lordship presented the brethren, in the names of himself and his daughters, with 300 rix-dollars, for the use of the school; an example which was generously followed by captain Sheridan.

Missionaries now, 1833, at Gnadenhutten, Hallbeck, Brauer, Nawhass, Schopman, Sonderman, and Stein. Communicants, 610; candidates, 93; 129 baptized or received; 388 baptized children; 33 candidates for baptism; 130 infant scholars. This mission is in a state of great prosperity. The church is filled with attentive hearers: the schools with crowds of children greater than ever before. The operations of the Holy Spirit are manifest.

GNATANGIA; an outstation of the L. M. S. on the island Rarotonga, one of the Hervey islands. C. Piman, missionary. More than 700 scholars are taught at this station. A new school-house, 90 feet by 35, is filled every morning at sunrise by adults who commit portions of the Scripture.

GOAHATTY; a station of the Serampore missions, in Assam, 413 miles N. of Serampore, and 345 N. by E. of Parca. It was commenced in 1820. Mr. Rne, who had resided in Assam several years as superintendent of public works, settled afterwards at Serampore. The station is likely to be very important in respect to its advantages. The country is under the British government, and is committed entirely to the care of a commissioner, Mr. Scott, who is personally a warm friend of the mission. It affords peculiar facilities for the distribution of the new edition of the Bible. Some of Mr. Rne's people have translated to Serampore no less a sum than 718 rupees for the publications issued from that press.

Gratifying progress has been made at Goahatty since 1829. The European residents have formed themselves into a society for maintaining schools. One has been opened with the best effect.

GOLD COAST; name given to a country in Africa, near the Atlantic, about 360 miles in length from E. to W. between the rivers Ancoche and Volta. The G. M. S. have a station here. (See USA.)

GORRUCKPORE; a town of Hindustan, about 100 miles N. of Benares, having about 70,000 inhabitants.

Some leading members of the European society in this place having long desired the presence of an English missionary, and having engaged to provide a house, and also to supply a considerable portion of the necessary expense, the Rev. Mr. Morris, of the G. M. S., proceeded to it in March, 1823, with a view to ascertain, from actual experience, the openings for usefulness. Amidst the ordinary difficulties arising from the misapprehension of the natives, he succeeded in establishing a boys' school, and Mrs. Morris collected around her a few girls. A severe attack of fever, however, greatly debilitated Mr. Morris soon after the commencement of his operations, and he resigned his appointment from all labor. The Rev. Michael Wilkinson and Mrs. Wilkinson were, therefore, appointed to the station, where Mr. Wilkinson still continues; but repeated attacks of illness have so weakened Mrs. Wilkinson as to compel her to return home.

The church was opened on the first Sunday in August, 1826; and, since that time, there have been two English and two Hindostanee services on Sunday.

At Gorruckpore, Michael Wilkinson is missionary. Robert V. Reynolds, catechist; various native assistants. In five schools are 89 boys, and in a girls' school 11 scholars. Two native societies and one English are held on Sunday.

GRAAF REINET; a station of the L. M. S. among the Hottentots. A. Van der Conneuwagen; 10 adult baptiz'd last year.

GRACE HILL; a station of the U. B. on the island Antigua, formed in 1782. At this station, 104 were baptized in one year.

GRAHAMSTOWN; a station of the L. M. S. among the Hottentots, South Africa, in the Albany district. John Monro, missionary.

No recent report of the L. M. S. from Grahamstown. The mission of the Wesleyans is very flourishing. On Sunday, in a town of 4,000 inhabitants, not a single shop is opened.

GRAND RIVER, which passes through Upper Canada, and after a course of 500 miles falls into the St. Lawrence, above Montreal. The Mohawk Indians are settled on this river, on a rich reservation of land, 12 miles wide and 40 miles in length. In 1822, the Genesee W. Methodist conference appointed the Rev. Alvin Torrey to introduce the gospel among them. This he did with considerable success. He was joined by other laborers, and very gratifying results followed. In 1823, there were reckoned more than 30 converts among the Indians, and as many among the white people. A Sabbath school was opened, which was attended by from 20 to 25 children. There are now 220 church members, and three schools, containing 300 adults under religious instruction.

GRAPE ISLAND: an island in the bay of Quinty, Upper Canada. It is about six or eight miles from the town of Belleisle, and contains 20 acres. In 1825, a portion of the Mississagas Indians removed to this island, and others in the vicinity, and through the exertions of the missionaries of the Methodist Missionary society, nearly the whole body have embraced Christianity. One island which they own contains 5,000 acres. The situation, being a retired one, has saved them from those temptations to which they would be exposed on the main land. At two schools, there are 210 adults under religious instruction. Scholars, (children) 50. Members of the church, 108. (See CANADA, UPRR.)

GRÆCE. The boundaries of Greece as settled by the protocol of the allied powers of February 3, 1830, are as follows: on the north, beginning at the mouth of the Aspropotamos, (Achelous) it runs up the southern bank to Angelo Castro; thence through the middle of the lakes Sacarofitis and Vrachori to mount Arotleria; thence to mount Axaros, and along the valley of Colouri and the top of Æta to the gulf of Zeiton. Acarnania and a great part of Ætolia and Thessaly are thus included from the Grecian State, and a Turkish barrier interposed between Greece and the Ionian islands. Candia, Samos, Paros, &c. are not included. The population of the state is estimated at about 635,000; 250,000 in the Peloponnesus; 175,000 in the islands; 180,000 on the Greek main land.

For six or eight years past, strenuous efforts have been made by various religious and philanthropic societies and individuals in England and the United States to communicate to the Greeks the blessings of knowledge and of pure Christianity. The following societies are now co-operating: the American Board of Foreign Missions; the American Episcopal Missionary society; and the Church and London Missionary societies. The following intelligent and interesting remarks are from an editorial article published in the Missionary Herald, of September, 1831.

"Le Courrier de la Grèce," for February 1, (13.) 1831, contains a list of the schools of instruction in liberated Greece, from which the following table is compiled.

Provinces.	Schools for teaching Ancient Greek.	Scholars.	Lancasterian Schools.	Scholars.
Peloponnesus,	19	678	36	2,970
The Islands,	15	1,073	33	2,930
Western Greece, (on the continent)	1	40	4	329
Eastern Greece, (ditto.)	1	40	3	407
Totals,	36	1,831	76	6,636

"The number of Lancasterian schools in the spring of 1829, was 25; and, in the spring of 1830, it was 62, containing 3,118 scholars. These are all established under the auspices of the government, and supported more or less at the public expense. There are a few private schools of both kinds; and in the Peloponnesus, there are nearly 2,000 children taught to read on the old method, so called in distinction from the Lancasterian, or new method. In the old schools the books are in the ancient Greek, which, being nearly unintelligible to the youths, they learn to read, and that is nearly all. The habit, thus created, of reading without thought, is lamentably prevalent among the people of the East, and must be broken up before books will exert their proper influence. The Lancasterian schools, bringing in, as they do, new books in the vernacular tongue, and a new method of instruction, are a happy innovation and improvement in every point of view; and should they prevail through the eastern world, will do much towards reviving the sleeping intellect.

"At Ægina, a central school has been established, containing 117 pupils, who are all instructed in the ancient Greek and the French languages, and in history and mathematics. Connected with this is a preparatory school, with 227 scholars. The orphan asylum, at Ægina, with which very many, if not almost all, of the children of these two schools are connected, contained, at the commencement of the present year, 407 boys, gathered from all parts of Greece.

"In a monastery, beautifully situated on the island of Poros, an ecclesiastical seminary was founded last autumn, with two professors and fifteen scholars. The ancient Greek, history, logic, rhetoric, and theology, are taught, with the canons of the church, the fathers, and the method of interpreting the Scriptures.

"Near Nauplion there is a military school, containing sixty pupils.

"Near the ancient ruins of Tyrus, on the plain of Argos, is a model-farm, on which are fifteen pupils, supported by government. Six are learning the art of printing in the printing-offices of government at Nauplion and Ægina; sixty-five are training in the national marine; and twenty-four in various professions and trades at Nauplion, Hydra, Ægina, and Syra.

"REMARKS FROM THE PROSPECTS OF EDUCATION IN GREECE. The prospects of Greece, ever since the standard of liberty was raised, ten years ago, have been in a state of constant, and often of rapid, change; yet, on the whole, they have been improving from that day to this. Not that this is true of them with respect to the popular apprehension, but such has been the fact. Greece was never so likely to be an independent and respectable state, as she is at this moment. Indeed, so strongly is almost the whole territory fortified by nature, so abundantly is it furnished with water power, and that easily and cheaply applied to use—so fertile are most of its valleys and plains in the necessities of life, and so admirably adapted is the whole country for pasturage—so without a parallel is its situation for commerce, and so numerous must commercial inducements and opportunities be to the people, who are industrious on land and enterprising at sea—that, let their independence only be fairly established, and they can hardly fail of taking a respectable rank in the great community of nations. There is such a quickness and perspicacity, too, in the national mind, and such an ardent curiosity, which every traveler acknowledges, and such a thirst for knowledge, evinced in the history of the educated portion of the Greeks from the year 1800 to 1821, when they burst the chains of Turkish slavery, that we cannot doubt the prevalence of learning again in Greece. Let the country only be free, and wealth will flow in among the people, whatever shall be their form of government; and those Greeks who so liberally patronized schools for Grecian youth, and the works of Grecian genius, during their national slavery, and in the face of every discouragement, may be expected to abound in such acts, when urged onward to literary enterprise by a more powerful array of motives than ever operated upon any other people.

"The French nation is, at this time, exerting a considerable influence in modifying the systems of education in Greece, and that country seems to be destined to exert a still greater influence. This is owing in part to the interest which the French nation has taken in the affairs of Greece. French troops liberated the Peloponnesus from the Egyptian army, which was covering it with desolation. A French scientific corps lately explored the antiquities, the geography, and the resources of the country; and Frenchmen being among the Greeks in great numbers, and always ready to impart their knowledge and assistance, the effect, in the forming period of the national institutions, could not fail to be great. This influence is increased, and will be continued, by the fact, that a knowledge of the French language is regarded by the Greeks as an essential part of a liberal education. This opens a channel from the fountain of French literature into Greece, and the Greeks are in danger of being flooded with French inability. French books will be multiplied to be translated more than any others. French school-books are believed to be the only ones which the Greek government has ordered translations to be made. The 'Manual of Mutual Instruction,' which the government of Greece has made the exclusive rule of Lancasterian schools, is a French work, by Sarasin; and the Greeks plead the example of the France in suspending a picture of the Saviour in the schools for the education of the pupils. In this point of view, as in many others, the late revolution in France is a cheering event. Whatever is now done in France to promote free and pure institutions, must exert some influence in Greece."

The Greek church in the kingdom of Greece in 1834, made independent of the patriarch of Constantinople and is closely connected with the state, as the established religion of the kingdom. The highest ecclesiastical authority is vested under the king in a permanent council, called, "The holy council in the kingdom of Greece." It is instructed to watch over the doctrines of the Greek church, and to control the contents of books designed for the youth and the clergy. When any man shall disturb the established church, "by false doctrine, by proselyting, or by other means," it is required to call on the civil arm to apply a remedy according to the laws. The common school laws, by an act of 1830, and show on the part of the government the most laudable desire to extend rapidly and judiciously the means of education among the people. Some restrictions are laid on schools and the circulation of books in the cities. Dr. Kotick, an evangelical man, has been appointed director of the public seminary for educating teachers at Npsioi.

GREEN BAY: bay on the west side of Lake Michigan, about 100 miles long, but in some places only 15 miles, in others from 20 to 30 miles broad. It lies nearly from N. E. to S. W. At the entrance of it from the lake is a string of islands extending N. to S., called the Grand Traverse. These are about 30 miles in length and serve to facilitate the passage of canoes, as they shelter them from the winds, which sometimes come with violence across the lake. The country around is chiefly occupied by the Menomony Indians.

GREEN BAY: a post-town, military post, and seat of justice for Brown county, Michigan territory, at S. end of Green Bay, near the entrance of Fox river; 180 miles S. W. of Mackinac; 220 N. by W. of Chicago; 365 E. Prairie du Chien. Lon. 87° 55' W.; lat. 45° N. Here is a settlement extending about four miles.

Rev. Mr. Cadle, by the American Episcopal Missionary society, successor of Rev. E. Williams, has labored for several years among the Menomony Indians, with encouraging success. The A. B. C. F. M. have established a mission among the Stockbridge Indians, near Green Bay. These Indians first removed from Stockbridge, Berkshire county, Massachusetts, to the western part of New York, and then to Ohio, thence back to New York, and then to Green Bay.

At Green Bay, in 1831, Messrs. Marsh and Abel L. Barber, missionaries, C. Hall, teacher, Mrs. Barber and Mrs. Hall, are employed at Green Bay. Mr. Barber expects soon to enter on some other field of labor. Mr. Marsh accompanied last year a Christian deputation of the Stockbridge Indians on a visit to the Sacs and Foxes. The mission is in a very prosperous condition.

GREENLAND: an extensive region towards the north pole, which is supposed to belong to North America. This country was discovered in the year 985, by some Norwegian, from Ireland; and it was named Greenland, from its superior verdure to Iceland. They planted a colony on the eastern coast; and the intercourse between this colony, Iceland, and Denmark, was continued till the beginning of the fifteenth century. In that century, by the gradual increase of the arctic ice, which on the west, the colony became almost inaccessible; while on the west a range of mountains, covered with perpetual snow, precluded all approach. This settlement contained several churches and monasteries; and is said to have extended about 200 miles in the south-east part. In some recent times, the western coast was chiefly explored by Davis and other English navigators; but there was no attempt to settle a colony. The country is said to be inhabited as far as 76° N. lat., but the Moravian settlements are in the south-west part. The people have some beavers, and a considerable number of sheep, for whose winter subsistence they cut the grass in summer and make it into hay. The short summer is very warm, but foggy; and the northern lights diversify the gloom of winter, which is very severe. It is said that the north-west coast of Greenland is separated from America by a narrow strait; that the natives of the two countries have some intercourse; and that the Esquimaux of America perfectly resemble the Greenlanders in their aspect, dress, mode of living, and language. Cape Farewell, the south-west point, is in W. lon. 42° 42', N. lat. 59° 35'.

The population was estimated, in 1805, at 6900; though the rambling life of the natives renders it difficult to ascertain the exact number.

The three first missionaries of the U. B., Matthew Stach, Christian Stach, and Christian David, went to Greenland in 1733. They labored 6 years without any apparent success.

The year 1740 was rendered remarkable by the change which took place in the brethren's mode of preaching; which is most happily described in the following narration of an encouraging instance of usefulness.

Johannes, an Indian of the Malukander nation, who had formerly been a very wicked man, was the first of that tribe whose heart was powerfully awakened. Through the preaching of the missionary, Christian Henry Lauch, the divine power was manifested in him in so powerful a manner, that he not only became a believer in Jesus Christ, but a blessed witness of the truth to his own nation.

The change which took place in the usual conduct of this man was very striking; for he had been distinguished in all parties met for riotous diversion as the most outrageous, and had even made himself a cripple by debauchery. He afterwards became a fellow-laborer in the congregation gathered from among the heathen. At one of the meetings which the brethren held for pastoral conversation and inquiry into the state of the congregations, he related the occasion of his conversion in the following manner, in consequence of their speaking with one another about the method of preaching to the heathen:—

"Brethren: I have been a heathen, and have grown old amongst them; therefore I know very well how it is with the heathen, and how they think. A preacher once came to us, desiring to instruct us, and began by proving to us that there was a God; on which we said to him: 'Well, and what then dost thou ignorantly of that? Now go back again to the place from whence thou comest.'"

"Then, again, another preacher came, and began to instruct us, saying, 'You must not steal, nor drink too much, nor lie, nor lead wicked lives.' We answered him, 'Fool that thou art! dost thou think we do not know that? Go, and learn it first thyself, and teach the people who do not belong to not to do these things; for who are greater drunkards, thieves, or liars, than thine own people?' Thus we sent him away, also.

"Some time after this, Christian Henry, one of the brethren, came to me, into my hut, and sat down by me. The contents of his discourse to me were nearly these:—'I come to thee in the name of the Lord of heaven and earth; he sends me to baptize thee that he would gladly save thee, and make thee happy, and deliver thee from the miserable state in which thou hast at present. To this end he became a man, gave his life a ransom for man, and shed his blood for man. All that believe in the name of this Jesus, obtain the forgiveness of sin; to all them that receive him, by faith, he giveth power to become the sons of God; the Holy Spirit dwelleth in their hearts, and they are made free, through the blood of Christ, from the slavery and dominion of sin. And though thou art a chief sinner, yet, if thou prayest to the Father, in his name, and believe in a sacrifice for thy sins, thou shalt be heard and saved, and he will give thee a crown of life, and thou shalt live with him in heaven forever.'"

"When he had finished his discourse, he lay down upon a board in my hut, fatigued by his journey, and fell into a sound sleep. I thought myself, what matter of man is this? There he lies, and sleeps so sweetly; I might kill him and throw him out into the forest, and who would regard it? But he is unconcerned: this cannot be a bad man; he fears no evil, not even from us, who are so savage, but sleeps comfortably, and places his life in our hands. However, I could not forget his words; they constantly recurred to my mind; even though I went to sleep, yet I dreamed of the blood which Christ hath shed for us. I thought—this is very strange, and quite different from what I have ever heard; so I went and interpreted Christian Henry's words to the other Indians."

As the result of the preaching of the cross, an extensive awakening took place. One of the baptized Greenlanders informed the missionaries that he had found his countrymen many leagues north to be so anxious to be instructed in the things of God, that they urged him to spend a whole night with them in conversation; and after he had retired, on the second night, some of them followed him, and constrained him to resume the subject. Even one of the angkoaks, or neocannars, was brought under such serious impressions, that he wept almost incessantly during two days, and asserted that he had dreamed he was in hell, where he witnessed scenes which it would be utterly impossible for him to describe. At the close of the year 1743, no less than 230 Greenlanders resided at New Herrnhut, of whom 85 had been baptized in the course of that year.

The unusual intensity of cold, some years after, was productive of all the horrors of famine.

In 1753 a new station was formed, which the brethren called Lichtenfels, at which the settlers were compelled to endure many privations and the scarcity that prevailed in the district, during the continuance of which many of the natives died of want; even the Greenland families were at last reduced to the necessity of feeding principally upon muskles and sea weed, and the missionaries were often brought into the most painful straits. Amidst a succession of temporal trials and of successes in their spiritual efforts, a third station was formed at the island of Onartok, where they had discovered with surprise, at the mouth of a warm spring, a verdant meadow, adorned with different kinds of flowers. This was, of course, a powerful attraction in such a country; but as the situation would have been inconvenient in some respects, they fixed upon a spot a few miles distant, to which they gave the name of Lichtenau. This district, situated about 400 miles from Lichtenfels, contained within the circuit of a few miles not less than 1000 inhabitants.

In 1833, there were in Greenland 4 stations, 16 missionaries, of whom 9 are married, and 1808 Greenland converts, of whom 530 are communicants. (See NEW HERRNHUT; LICHTENFELS; LICHTENAU; and FREDERICKSTAL.) The whole of the New Testament and a considerable portion of the Old have been translated into the vernacular tongue. Nearly all persons belonging to the older congregations are able to read and write. Many of the natives have proved themselves faithful servants and handmaids of Jesus. The effect of the preaching of the gospel has been most salutary. The national superstitions have almost entirely disappeared. Cruelty and licentiousness, with a whole train of attendant vices, have almost wholly given place to brotherly kindness, decorum, and a good measure of civilization.

GREENADA; one of the Caribbee islands, lying 30 leagues north-west of Tobago. It is 15 miles long and 12 broad, finely wooded, and the soil suited to produce sugar, tobacco, and indigo. It was taken from the French in 1762, confirmed to the English in 1763, taken by the French in 1779, and restored to the English in 1783. In 1785, the French landed some troops, and caused an insurrection, which was not quelled till 1796. St George is the capital.

The Wesleyans commenced a mission here in 1788; but the progress of the gospel has been slow among the negroes, who are almost wholly ignorant of the English language, and speak a corrupted dialect of French, without proper words and phrases in which to receive adequate instruction. In addition to this, they are under the influence of the gross superstitions of popery, and also of those derived from their African ancestors.

GRIFFIN-TOWN; a station of the L. M. S. on the island Eimeo, one of the Sandwich Islands.

Griffin-town and the church established here have suffered an afflictive bereavement in the death of the chief, Vara, a truly pious man. Several other persons of exemplary piety have died. A number of children have been baptized. Mr. Blossom remains at this station, giving special attention to the cultivation of cotton.

GRIQUA TOWN; a station of the L. M. S. 530 miles north-east of Cape Town.

The mission was commenced in 1802.

A number of Griquas, called Bergenaars, (or Mountaineers) of their having stationed themselves among the mountains, committed, a few years after, many acts of depredation and violence. The Griqua chiefs had, on several occasions, commendably exerted themselves to disperse and reclaim these marauders, but without effect. In reference to one of their principal efforts made with that view, the following statement is extracted from a letter from John Melville, Esq. government agent at Griqua Town, to the editor of the South African Chronicle, (written for the purpose of obviating certain misstatements of a communication inserted in a preceding number of that paper,) as it beautifully illustrates the moral and civilizing tendency of Christianity in relation to the Griquas:—

"The Griqua chiefs proceeded to the station of the Bergenaars, to take such measures as might put a stop to the system of depredation which they were carrying on against the tribes around them. Instead of showing any disposition to alter their conduct, they set the commando at defiance, and maintained that attitude till night came on with rain, when they made their escape. The commando returned to Griqua Town with 4000 head of cattle, followed by some hundreds of the people of the plundered tribes, to whom a considerable part of these cattle belonged. The station was in the presence of savage tribes, a scene of justice took place which would have done credit to any civilized people. The chiefs restored to these poor people all their cattle, without reserving a single hoof to themselves to which any one of those people could establish a right. When the people had got their cattle, they were told that they might go to their own place of abode; but they were so struck with the justice of the Griqua chiefs, that they begged to be allowed to put themselves under their protection, and follow them to Griqua Town."

Missionaries in 1833 in Griqua Town, Peter Wright, and Isaac Hughes, assistant. Inhabitants, 900 adults and 810 children, nearly half of whom are Buchuanas. Congregation, 400 or 500. Communicants, 57. Day scholars, 200. A missionary society raised in the year 104 six-dollars. A large measure of temporal and spiritual blessings have been enjoyed at this station. Andrew Waterboer, the chief, is a very superior man, and truly pious. The whole of the Griquas, amounting to 4900, have renounced polygamy, bear the Christian name, and discover an acquaintance with Christianity.

GROENEKLOOF; a station of the United Brethren in South Africa, about 40 miles north of Cape Town, among the Hottentots.

This station was commenced in 1845, under the patronage of the earl of Caledon, the governor of the Cape. The brethren were assigned about 6000 acres of land, on which they permitted none to build, but such as engaged to live regular lives; and on these principles a settlement was soon formed. In 4 years, 93 were baptized.

About this time a large and handsome chapel that had been erected was much damaged by the rains and floods, from which the whole settlement sustained great injury. In the following year this, though still felt, was in a great measure repaired; the house of the brethren were animated by many proofs of the divine regard; and the harvest was, providentially, very abundant. At the close of 1855, also, this station enjoyed much of the blessing of God.

B. and F. B. S. has made valuable donations of Bibles and Testaments to this mission.

Number of inhabitants in 1833, at Groenekloof, 660. Missionaries, Clemens, Lehman, Lemertz, Meyer. Communicants, 210. An infant school of 60 scholars was in operation. The Hottentots are here particularly exposed to the use of ardent spirits.

HAABAI ISLANDS, a group belonging to the Friendly islands, in the vicinity of the Tonga islands, about 20° S. and 175° W. The W. M. S. commenced a mission in 1830. John Thomas and John Hobbs, missionaries. The kioq is a class member. The members were doubled in the course of a few months. Very few Sabbaths pass without new accessions to the church. It is mentioned that 10, 20, or 40 turn to the Lord at once, and on one day more than 100 were added. The number of members in the Haabai and Tonga islands is 1100, being an increase of 600 in the year. Scholars, 1900, under the care of 151 teachers.

HAKALAU, an outstation of Hilo, on Hawaii, of the A. B. C. F. M. HANKEY; a new station of the L. M. S. in South Africa, named after its treasurer, in a situation peculiarly beautiful, near the Chumtore river, between Paalatsdorp and Bethelsdorp. The Rev. W. Foster proceeded to Paalats, to take charge of a seminary to be formed here for the education of the children of the missionaries in that country, and for the preparation of Christian natives for instructing their own countrymen. This place, however, is deemed by Mr. Foster, for very important reasons, ineligible.

In 1835, at Harkey, the inhabitants were 437. Congregation, 250. Communicants, 53. Day scholars, 150; Sunday, 50; infant, 50. Parents are so desirous to educate their children that they will incur considerable expense. A missionary society has 173 members, and a temperance society has been highly useful.

HANKEY CITY; a station of the L. M. S. on Tahiti, one of the Georgian islands. H. Gott, missionary.

HANWELL; an outstation of Colombo, Ceylon, under the care of the B. M. S. (See Colombo.)

HARMONY; a station of the A. B. C. F. M. among the Osage Indians, about 80 miles above Fort Osage, on the Missouri, commenced under the care of the United Foreign Missionary society in 1821, and in 1822 transferred to the A. B. C. F. M.

HARMONY, Arkansas is missionary, Daniel H. Austin, mechanic and steward, Samuel B. Bright, farmer, and their wives, Richard Colby, mechanic, John B. Austin, teacher, and Mary Etris. In a settlement near Harmony where Mr. Jones had preached, a number of persons have been converted. The schools remain much as they were.

HASTINGS; a station of the C. M. S. 13 miles from Free Town, Western Africa.

The station at Hastings is for the present suspended for want of laborers.

HAWAII, formerly spelled Owhyhee; an island in the Pacific ocean, the largest of the Sandwich islands, 97 miles long and 78 wide, containing 4000 square miles. Lat. 20° 19' N., lon. 155° 58' W.; discovered by captain Cook in 1778, and where he was killed, February 14, 1779. For a particular account of the island, and of the missions upon it, see SANDWICH ISLANDS.

HAWES; a station of the A. B. C. F. M. among the Cherokee Indians. The mission was commenced in 1823.

In consequence of the removal of the Cherokees, Hawes has been abandoned.

HAWES TOWN, in the district of Papara, Tahiti, Georgian islands, where the work of civilization and evangelization is proceeding by means of the L. M. S. This station also takes its name from the late Rev. Dr. Hawes; and for several years it has been attended with prosperity.

Mr. Davies continues to be prospered in his work in Hawes Town. Communicants, 403, of whom 33 had been admitted during the year. Church discipline has been salutary. Nine candidates for communion, and 9 members removed to other churches, including the principal station and the 2 branches, congregation is 1060. Scholars, 394.

HERRON; a new station of the U. B. in Labrador. The Brethren's society in London kindly sent materials for erecting the necessary buildings. A desirable opportunity is thus afforded to the northern Esquimaux for hearing the gospel.

The missionaries at Heron are Stock and Meatzel. Congregation, 102. HEMEL EN ARDE; a hospital for the relief of Hotentot lepers, about 12 miles from Caledon, South Africa, and a short distance from the sea. The Rev. Peter Leitner, one of the U. B., came here in 1823, and chiefly confined his labors to the hospital, under the superintendence of the government, which contained, at that time, 156 patients. The cordiality with which he was received excited hopes of success, which have been more than realized.

In January, 1826, he writes:—"Among our patients many are very weak and declining; and during last year, 12 baptized and 14 unbaptized departed this life; 25 adults and 5 children were baptized, and 8 were admitted to the Lord's supper. The whole number of inhabitants of this hospital was, at the close of 1825, 106. To all of them the glad tidings of great joy are proclaimed, and they are both publicly and privately instructed in the blessed truths of the gospel. Our people are remarkably attentive and devout at all their meetings. John Tietze, laborer.

In 1832, there were at Hemel en Arde, 5 leper candidates for baptism, 11 adults and 1 child baptized; 10 candidates for communion; 7 communicants; 21 died; 96 in hospital.

HERNHUT, New; the first settlement of the U. B. in Greenland, privately instituted in 1793.

Missionaries at New Herhnut in 1833, Grillich and Tietzen, and sisters Herberich and Richter. Congregation, 363, of whom 190 are communicants.

HERRHUT, New; a settlement of the U. B. on the island St. Thomas. It was first called Possanenberg. It received its present name in 1753. For several years, 100 persons annually were received as members of this church.

At New Herhnut, in St. Thomas, the missionaries are Sybrecht, Danus, and Wled. Congregation, 979.

HIRIFO; a station of the W. M. S. on Tonga, one of the Friendly islands.

HILO; a station of the A. B. C. F. M. on Hawaii. Joseph Goodrich, Sheldon Dibble, and David B. Lyman, missionaries, and their wives. Number able to read, 2359. Congregation, 600. A very interesting protracted meeting of 8 days was held in December, 1833. On the first Sabbath to March, 1834, 16 persons were admitted to the church. Three schools, 300 Sabbath scholars.

HINDOSTAN, or INDIA; a region of Asia, which extends from Cape Comorin to the Himalaya mountains, by which it is separated on the north from Thibet and Tartary. The northern part extends from the river Sindo, or Indus, on the west, bordering upon Persia, to the mountains which separate Bengal from Cassay and the Birman dominions; in the southern part, the bay of Bengal lies east and the Indian ocean south and west. It is situated between N. lat. 8° and 35°, and E. lon. 66° and 92°. Its greatest length is about 1560 miles; its breadth, 1500. Area, 1,280,000 square miles. The climate and seasons are considerably diversified by difference of latitude and local situation; but through the regions of Hindostan, there is some similarity of climate.

The population has been variously estimated, from 100 to 150,000,000, who are principally idolaters and about half British subjects. Mohammedans, Christians, and Jews, are numerous.

Among the Hindoos there is a remarkable distinction of caste. Caste is a Portuguese word; jati, the Indian term, signifies a genus or kind. The different castes of the Hindoos are, therefore, considered as so many different species of human beings, and it is believed that different forms of worship and habits of life are necessarily adapted to each. Originally there were four castes, which are supposed to have sprung from different parts of Brahma's body, and from such parts as to establish their different ranks. The first were theologians, or the brahmins; the second were kings and soldiers; the third merchants and husbandmen; the fourth mechanics and servants. The distribution is of remote antiquity. In process of time, the original distinction extended to a subdivision of employments. There are now about 100 different castes, all of which are included under the general denominations of brahmins and soeders. Subdivision has been added to subdivision. The lowest caste of soeders, for instance, admits of many subordinate castes, extending to persons of the most servile occupations, and each invariably follows the same trade as his forefathers. From generation to generation the same family follow the same business, and hold the same rank; a circumstance which, while it suppresses every aspiring aim, has greatly contributed to perfect the ingenuity of Hindoo artisans. The brahmins, however, reserve to themselves the right of descending to secular employments, and even to those which are menial. According to the rules of caste those of one man may intermarry, nor even eat or drink with those of another. It is said that in the high castes will even drink water in the family of white man; and in those countries where Europeans are their rulers, the heathen rank them under the lowest castes. The distinction of caste is interwoven with every circumstance of life; adherence to it is viewed as a matter of religion, and the castes become so many religious sects. If one violates the rules of his caste he is excommunicated, which is called losing caste. From that time his nearest relations abandon him; and he seldom recover his former standing, and only by a large fee to the brahmins. In this way he may generally be restored, but not always. Dr. Carey mentions the case of a man who had lost caste by means of a woman in his family, who, while the Mohammedans had possession of the province, had been compelled to live with a Mussulman. He offered 10,000 pounds, or about 44,400 dollars, for the recovery of his caste, but he could not regain it. It was said that the celebrated and in many respects liberal minded Rammohun Roy did not eat with Europeans while in India.

As to religion, three of the six schools of philes; by once famous in India were atheistical. The doctrines of these atheists were established for a considerable period, and they are still taught in the systems which prevail throughout China, Japan, the Birman empire, Siam, Ceylon, &c. These philosophers, of whom Vedvas, the compiler of the Vedu, was one of the most distinguished, taught that every thing we can see, or form any conception of, is to be referred to one or other of two principles: it is either spirit or matter, since, beside these, nothing else exists; that all spirit is God; and that God exists without attributes, in a state of eternal repose, intangible and unconnected with any of the forms of matter. They also teach, that the spirit of man is individuated deity; that in this connexion with matter, spirit is degraded, and that the soul, freed from the grossness of the material earth is to seek emancipation, and return to the blessed source from which he (that is, spirit, for I, thou, and he, are referrible only to spirit) has been severed. The mode of obtaining emancipation is by the practice of ceremonies denominated jeeva, all of which are connected with bodily austerities and tortures, having for their object the annihilation of all conscious connexion with the body and with material things. Such a delusive and unprofitable process, were the spirit ever while in the body, in a state of civic tranquility, resembling that of God; for the passions alone are the sources of pain; and will fit the individuated spirit for reunion to God; for the passions are the sources of life and death; and confine the individuated spirit to a continued course of transmigrations, and rivet its union to matter. These speculations form the belief of all the Hindoos; and there are still a number of mendicants in India who imitate the jageses. The people at large do not become jageses, because these austerities are incompatible with the existence of human society; but they make constant allusions to this doctrine of spirit, to the subjugation of the passions, and to transmigration as inevitably attaching to men, till perfect abstraction and absorption are obtained.

The popular superstitions of the Hindoos are deeply affecting. While they verbally admit the doctrine of the divine unity, they speak of 330,000,000 of gods. They prostrate themselves before dead mat by subscription on the spot, was well attended. A school was also formed, and tracts were distributed in great numbers, which were carried to different parts of the country. A second chapel was afterwards erected. Here a Mussulman moonshoe, or teacher, was baptized; an event which occasioned great surprise among that class of natives, and led to much inquiry. Among other pleasing incidents, Mr. Statham mentions the following: "A poor old woman was sick, and sent for me; she appeared to be very ill indeed, yet calm and resigned. On my asking her how she felt with regard to entering on an eternal world, she said, 'It will be a happy change for me.' I asked the grounds of such a hope. She clasped her Bengalee Bible, which lay by her cot, and said, 'I find Christ here, Christ in my heart, and Christ is in heaven. He died for poor sinners like me; I know he is able to save me. I believe he will;' and then she prayed so sweetly, that I could not forbear crying out, 'Oh, that my latter end may be like hers!'"

At Howrah, Mr. Thomas has lately baptized 2 natives.

HUAHINE: one of the Society islands, in the Pacific ocean, 30 leagues from Tahiti. It is 21 miles in circuit, populous and fertile, and has a commodious harbor, called Owharhe. W. lon. 151° 5', S. lat. 16° 44'.

Here the L. M. S. have a station. Previous to its formation, idolatry had been abolished through the influence of the efforts made at Tahiti; but the missionaries, on their arrival, were received with apparent coldness by the body of the people, who manifested little desire to enjoy religious instruction. The tone of feeling, however, soon changed; the missionaries were treated with the greatest deference and respect, and every exertion was made to facilitate their object. In 1822, it was stated that the congregation on the Sabbath days usually consisted of from 1000 to 1400 persons; that 72 adults had been baptized, and 38 children; that 400 candidates for baptism were receiving preparatory instruction; that a Sunday school had been formed, containing about 230 boys and 120 girls; that the average number of adults and children in the native schools was about 450; and that the contributions at the third anniversary of the Huahine A. M. S. amounted to 12 balls of arrow-wood, and 6349 bamboos of cocoa-nut oil. Civilization was also rapidly advancing.

Some time after this, a code of laws was drawn up, approved by the king and chiefs, and adopted by the people; some works were prepared for the press; and a society for the relief of the sick and disabled was established by the natives. After describing the particulars of the change produced by this mission, the deputation proceed as follows:—"In fact, the improvement of the people in industry, and their advancement in the scale of society, are evident, that every foreigner who comes here is struck with surprise and delight. We seemed rather to be in an English town than in a country so lately in a barbarous state. That all this mighty change should have been effected in so short a time as six years, would appear almost incredible, did we not witness the fact with our own eyes. But it is the work of God and not of man. The intervention of an Almightly agency can alone account for the effects produced. At the same time, we will not withhold our meed of praise from those who have been made the honored instruments of effecting this great work." The deputation conclude their report as follows:—"On a general and minute view of both the temporal and religious condition of this mission station, there is every reason for gratitude to God, and encouragement to that society which has had the honor of conferring so many blessings on this people. Had nothing more been done by the L. M. S. than has been effected in this one station, all its labors and expenses would have been most amply compensated."

After these pleasing statements, it is the more painful to add, that a calamitous event, which happened night to this station, during the year 1826, has been made an occasion, on the part of some of the natives, for acts highly discreditible to their character. It seems that an American vessel called the Hyrc, commanded by captain Coffin, on the 21st of November struck on the reef. The people belonging to the vessel, considering their situation perilous, abandoned it to a body of the natives, who were requested by the captain to make every possible effort to save the property on board. These natives having, during the night, found a quantity of opium, and drunk of it immoderately, proceeded to appropriate to their own use a number of articles belonging to the ship. They afterwards restored a part of this property, but not the whole. Mahine, the principal chief of Huahine, who was at the time on the opposite side of the island, on being informed of what had taken place, acted in a most commendable manner. He made a present to the captain, as some compensation for the loss he had sustained, adopted the same mode of recovering the remaining property, and even himself personally engaged in watching it. The greater part of the natives who were involved in the guilt of the above-mentioned transactions had no connexion with the mission; but it is painful to state, that some of them had made a profession of religion. With few exceptions, these have since manifested repentance, and have been restored to their accustomed intercourse with their fellow-Christians. A spirit of holy jealousy and self-examination appears to have been excited very generally among the people of the station by these occurrences, and a more diligent attention to the means of grace has been the result.

The regular services of the station at Huahine have been well attended, especially on the Sabbath, by those who remained on the island during the war, and by all since the cessation of hostilities. Mr. Barff continues his lectures twice a week. Forty-eight were baptized last year; total since the mission was begun, 724 adults, 770 children. Increase of inhabitants in 1832, 21; 29 marriages. Scholars, 350. Sunday scholars, 300. Petitions, 21,000. Charitable subscriptions 3,612 measures of oil, worth 22 pounds sterling.

IONIAN ISLANDS; a republic in the south of Europe, under the protection of Great Britain, situated in the Ionian sea, along the western coast of Greece and Albania. It is often called the Republic of the Seven Islands, on account of the seven chief islands of which it is composed. Lat. 35° 50'—39° 57' N., lon. 19°—23° 17' E. The inhabitants, about 227,000 in number, are of Greek origin. There are 8,000 Italians and 7,000 Jews. In 1825, the exports amounted to $660,000. The commercial flag of the islands is acknowledged as an independent flag, though the islands are entirely dependent on Great Britain. There is a British high commissioner at Corfu, and Great Britain has a right to occupy the fortresses and keep garrisons.

Under the patronage of lord Nugent, the high commissioner of the Ionian islands, much good may be expected. Female teachers will soon be sent out. The progress of the children in a female school at Santa Maria of 107 scholars, excites general surprise. The manners of the children are greatly improved. (See CORFU, and ZANTE.)

IRWIN HILL; a station of the U. B. on the island Jamaica. Brother Light is the missionary at this station.

J.

JAFFNA, or JAFFNAPATAN; a peninsula in the northern part of the island Ceylon, 40 miles long and 10 miles wide, and inhabited by Malabars. They use the Tamil or Malabar language, which is spoken by eight or nine millions on the neighboring continent. In 1816, the Rev. James Richards, Edward Warren, Daniel Foot, and Benjamin C. Meigs, under the care of A. B. C. F. M., commenced a mission. In this district. Boarding-schools and free schools were soon established, and afterwards seminaries of a higher order. Several interesting revivals of religion have been enjoyed.

At the church connected with each station the gospel has been regularly preached, and also at many of the school bungalows and other places. Many of the native teachers and catechists render valuable service in this way. Concentrated labor, on a small spot, with a gradual enlargement of the field, and an occasional extension of effort to more distant places in the neighborhood, has been from the first the plan of operating in this mission, with the best results. Continued meetings of three days have been held, with much advantage. This mission has a very superior system of schools. The preparatory school at Tillypally has been transferred to Batticotta, and connected with the seminary there as a preparatory class. In place of it, English day schools have been formed at some of the stations. They have suffered much by the prevalence of the cholera. The number of village schools is about 78, and the number of scholars in them and in the English schools is 3,415. The whole number of schools at the stations is not given. At three of them, there are 52 schools. Sixteen members of the seminary finished their course in September, 1832. In the first class are 23 members; second, 31; third, 23; fourth, 35; fifth, 23. Total, 140. Teachers 10; theological class, 25. The principal college building, Outley Hall, will probably soon be completed. Of the 147 at the seminary, 53 are church members. The committee have authorized the employment at each station of native agency to the amount of one preacher, two catechists, five readers, and 20 schoolmasters. The chief design of the seminary is to raise up competent native assistants. The female central school at Osooville contains 50 girls. The missionaries are authorized to increase the number of scholars in the female boarding-schools to 100.

There are now two presses belonging to the mission, with fonts of type in Tamil and English. The establishment is at Maneply. The church mission press at Nellore has been much employed by our missionaries. The missionaries of all the stations hold monthly meetings for business, observe the monthly concert and the monthly meeting for prayer for young men preparing for the ministry, occasionally assemble for social prayer, and often assist each other. The native converts have temperance, moral, and evangelical societies. Great difficulties exist in respect to a perfect union of feeling, owing to the influence of caste, and the difference between the European and Hindoo races. There are now three native preachers, 35 pious catechists, readers, &c. &c.; 30 pious schoolmasters, and more than 50 pious members of the seminary training for future usefulness. The whole number of church members now living is about 224.

The missionaries have been instructed to send two of their number to the coast opposite Jaffna for the purpose of commencing a mission. A printing press will probably be soon established at Madras. Mr. Spaulding has surveyed the coast, and is understood to have considered the district of Madras as the most eligible site.

For further particulars, see CEYLON, BATTICOTTA, MANEPLY, TILLYPALLY, and OODOOVILLE.

Jaffna or Jaffnapatan; a populous town, the capital of the district of Jaffna. Lat. 9° 42' N., lon. 80° 18' E. The W. M. S. established a mission here in 1814.

It is mentioned by the Wesleyan missionaries in 1833, respecting Jamaica, that much light has been diffused by missionary labor. At each station, there have been signal trophies of the power of divine grace. Several very efficient native missionaries have been raised up. (See BATTICOLE, and TRINCOMALEE.) At Jaffia, with Point Pedro, Peter Percival is missionary, John George, Ralph Scott, John Hunter, and John P. Sanmuggam, native assistants.

JAMAICA, an island of the West Indies, discovered by Columbus in 1494, and occupied by Spain in 1565. It was attacked by the British and ceded to them in 1660. It is 100 leagues W. St. Domingo, nearly the same distance S. Cuba, and is of an oval figure, 170 miles long and 60 broad. It is divided into three counties, Middlesex, Surry, and Cornwall, and contains upwards of 4,000,000 acres. A ridge of hills runs lengthwise from E. to W., whence numerous rivers take their rise on both sides, though none of them are navigable. In the valleys are sugar-canes, and such a variety of fruit-trees, as to make the country exceedingly beautiful. The year is divided into two seasons, the wet and dry; but the rains are not so frequent as formerly, which is supposed to be owing to the cutting down of the woods. The products of the island are in great variety and plenty. This island is now the most valuable of the British West India colonies.

In 1795, the Maroons, or original natives, who inhabited the mountains, rose against the English; they were not killed, and the negroes, St. John de la Vega is the seat of government, but Kingston is the mart of trade. In this island the U. B. have labored, amidst many trials and difficulties, since the year 1754.

In 1804, 50 years from the commencement of the mission, the brethren observe: "Though we cannot exult over an abundant ingathering of souls, or even our present prospects, yet we have sufficient cause of gratitude to God for having preserved us in Jamaica, which, in his own good time, may grow up into a rich harvest. It appears, that from the beginning of this mission to the present period, 938 negroes have been baptized."

New stations were afterwards commenced, which appeared to be the scenes of a very serious and progressive awakening. The following accounts will describe the state of the various departments of the mission, at the date affixed.

Eden, May, 1823.—"When I came to this place, 12 years ago," says brother Becker, "I found very few who knew any thing more than that they had been formerly baptized by a missionary. Not long after, I perceived that by the power of his word, preached in simplicity, the Lord caused convictions to arise in the minds of the negroes, and their blind eyes to be opened: many came to inquire what they must do to be saved. At present his word is frequently done. Our new church is so small, it could not hold the congregation."

Fairfield, February 14, 1826. Brother Ellis announces the finishing and opening of a new church at this place, and observes: "In the year 1825, the number of persons at Fairfield who attained to further privileges in the church were as follows: admitted candidates for baptism or reception, 110; baptized as adults, 22; received into the congregation, 74; admitted candidates for the holy communion, 91; communicants, 99; re-admitted to the congregation, 9; children baptized, 31."

In 1789, the Rev. Dr. Coke, of the W. M. S., visited Jamaica, and preached a few times to increasing congregations, and with but little opposition. Mr. Hammett, however, who was afterwards appointed to labor in Kingston, where a commodious chapel was erected, experienced so much persecution, that his life was frequently in danger, and he was absolutely compelled to refrain from preaching by candle-light. Some of the members were under the necessity of guarding their place of worship, lest the outrageous mob should demolish it; and one night, between 11 and 12 o'clock, some persons actually broke down the gates of the court leading to the chapel, and would probably have committed still greater outrages, had they not been checked in their lawless proceedings by the arrival of the town-magistrate, through the mediation of a gentleman of influence in the town, the magistrates were induced to publish an advertisement, which, for some time, kept the rioters within tolerable bounds.

The flames of persecution, which had hitherto raged so furiously, now began to subside, and the brethren who were left in Jamaica were soon enabled to extend their ministrations to Port Royal, Montego Bay, and several plantations in the country; and they had the pleasing consciousness of knowing that their labors were not in vain.

In April, 1802, some of the local preachers belonging to the society at Kingston paid a visit to a village called Morant Bay, and found many of the inhabitants disposed to join in public worship. They were seconded in their endeavors by Messrs. Fish and Campbell, then residing in the island; and in a short time a small society was formed. The enemies of religion, however, were exceedingly angry with the congregation, and resolved, if possible, to crush the young cause. They accordingly presented the houses in which divine service was performed as nuisances, at the quarter sessions; but, as they could substantiate no charge, their malignant attempt proved unavailing; and the meetings were continued with every appearance of increasing prosperity. Several trials and imprisonments still awaited the laborers, and at length the house of assembly thought proper to pass an act, which, whilst it professed to recommend the instruction of the slaves in the doctrines of the established church, strictly prohibited the Wesleyan missionaries from presuming to teach them, or even to admit them into their houses or places of worship, under the penalty of fine or imprisonment.

The situation of the missionaries was now painful indeed. "Frequent," says Dr. Coke, "before the chapel was completely shut, while men of free condition entered, to hear the preaching, the slaves crowded about the doors, which the edict forbade them to enter, with looks of the most expressive sorrow, and words of the most penetrating eloquence."

The intolerant act passed by the house of assembly was no sooner transmitted to England, than it was set aside by George III. But though the enemies of religion were thus frustrated in their attempt, they contrived, by temporary ordinances, to throw insuperable obstacles in the way of the missionaries, whose chapel was, in consequence, shut up for a succession of years. In December, 1815, however, it was re-opened by Mr. John Shipman, who succeeded, after several unsuccessful applications, in obtaining a license to preach the gospel.

In 1833, the Brethren had seven stations in Jamaica, viz. New Eden, Irwin Hill, Fairfield, New Carmel, Mesopotamia, New Fulnee, and New Bethlehem. Twenty missionaries, 5,146 negroes, of whom 1,478 are communicants.

In compliance with the solicitation of a mulatto Baptist preacher, named Moses Baker, who had for some years labored among the negroes in Jamaica, the Rev. John Rowe, of the W. M. S., arrived in February, 1814. In April, he took a house at Falmouth, and opened a school, with the hope of lessening the expenses of the committee on his account. He also opened a gratuitous Sabbath school, for the children of poor people, and slaves, whose owners would permit them to attend.

On the 21st of November, 1815, Mr. Lee Comper, accompanied by his wife and two of the members of Dr. Ryland's church, in Broad-street, sailed from Bristol to occupy other stations in Jamaica, with an especial view to the instruction of the slaves, and the children of slaves, under the sanction of their respective proprietors. On their arrival, they at first fixed their residence near Old Harbor, St. Dorothy; but afterwards removed to Kingston, at the pressing invitation of the negro Baptists, who are said to amount to some thousands in and near that place. Here Mr. Comper obtained a license from the mayor; and he and the pleasing prospect of becoming useful. Mr. Rowe, meanwhile, was removed from his labors by the hand of death.

As assistance was much needed, the Rev. James Coultart arrived in Kingston harbor May 9, 1817, and in less than a fortnight succeeded in obtaining a license to preach among the negroes. Both he and Mrs. Coultart were, however, much grieved on finding Mr. Comper in such a debilitated state, from repeated attacks of the ague, that he was unable to perform his duties. Mr. Coultart, however, in time partially recovered, he judged it advisable to quit the West Indies, and remove to America.

Thus unexpectedly deprived of his fellow-laborer, and left to sustain the whole weight of the mission, in which he had merely anticipated employment as an assistant, Mr. Coultart was doomed to encounter still more serious difficulties, and to submit to a loss much more distressing than any he had before sustained. In the latter end of the year, and towards the close of September, the partner of his affections was seized with a violent fever, which, in a short time, put a period to her mortal existence.

Subsequently to this, Mr. Coultart's indisposition increased to such an alarming degree, that it became indispensably necessary for him to return, at least for a season, to England. The Rev. Messrs. Kitching and the Rev. Messrs. Rowe, who had been sent to Jamaica, the former succeeded in the autumn of 1818 to his place of destination, and the latter sailed from England early in the ensuing spring. Their reception appears to have been extremely kind; and they were encouraged by the circumstance of the congregation increasing so rapidly to enlarge the place of worship, so as to accommodate 250 persons more than had ever previously attended. Scarcely, however, had they entered fully upon their labors, and congratulated themselves on the promising aspect of the mission, when Mr. Godden was deprived of his amiable and excellent wife; and within less than two months after that afflictive providence, Mr. Kitching, who had transmitted the "heavy tidings" to England, was himself numbered with the dead.

Mr. Coultart, in the mean time, having derived much benefit from a residence of several months in England, and having entered a second time into the conjugal state, returned to Jamaica, and resumed his labors at Kingston. In his public ministrations, however, he appears to have suffered severely from the confined limits of the place of worship, and the heat arising from an overflowing congregation.

At Kingston, Mr. Coultart had, in the mean time, commenced the erection of a neat, substantial chapel, situated on lofty ground, near the entrance into the city, and calculated to hold 2,000 persons. He had, also, many encouraging evidences that the power of God attended the dispersion of the word of truth; and nearly 2,000 persons had been admitted into church fellowship within the space of twelve months, notwithstanding the utmost discrimination appears to have been exercised.

Mr. Coultart relates the following proof of high estimation of religious privileges:—"A slave wished his owner to give him permission to attend with God's people to pray: his answer was, 'No: I will rather sell you to any one who will buy you.' 'Will you,' said he, 'suffer me to buy myself free, if you can?' 'If you do, you shall pay dearly for your freedom; as we are going to pray, two hundred and fifty pounds is your price.' 'Well, massa,' said the negro, who knew that the common price for a slave was about one hundred and forty pounds, 'it a great deal money, but mi must pray; if God will help me, me will try and buy you free. He has been working hard, and at last sold all himself and his wife had, except his blanket, to purchase liberty to pray in public, or, in other words, to meet with those who love Jesus Christ!"

In the course of the year 1823, some hundreds of members were added to the churches in Kingston, and from that time, notwithstanding various personal and relative afflictions, the missionaries have had much reason to rejoice.

The W. M. S. have about ten circuits in Jamaica, 30 stations, and 15,000 members.

On the 31st of December, 1831, a dreadful inurrection of the slaves broke out in Jamaica. Martial law was proclaimed; 150 plantations were destroyed; loss of property, 15,000,000 pounds; about 2,000 negroes were killed; not far from 30,000 men were under arms at one time. The Baptist and Methodist missionaries were for a time strongly implicated as the authors of this insurrection, but they have been completely vindicated. Lord Goderich has expressed his sense of the discretion and judgment manifested by the Wesleyan missionaries. The only immediate cause which has been ascertained is, that the negroes were deprived of the Christmas holidays, which they had long enjoyed. The great reason is the bitterness of their cup of slavery.

The Baptist missions in Jamaica were thrown into great confusion in consequence of the inurrections and persecutions which took place in 1832 and 1833, in Jamaica. Active measures are taking since the passage of the emancipation act to restore them. For further particulars, see WEST INDIES.

JAUNPORE; an outstation of the C. M. S. near Goruckpore, Hindostan. A chapel has been erected at this place, and schools established.

JAVA; a large island in the eastern sea, between 60° and 90° of S. lat., and between 105° and 115° of E. lon. Its length is 642 miles and its greatest breadth 128. The population in 1815 was about 5,000,000. Ten million pounds of sugar are annually raised. The L. M. S. have a mission on this island. (See BATAVIA.)

Mr. Bruckner, of the L. M. S., continues to labor at Samarang, in Java, without any renewal of molestation from the police. He has circulated 14,000 Javanese tracts. He preaches both in Javanese and Malay.

JERUSALEM. Its environs are barren and mountainous. It lies on the western declivity of a hill of basalt, surrounded with rocks and deep valleys. It is about two miles in circuit, with pretty high walls, and six gates. Of 25,000 inhabitants, 13,000 are Mohammedans, and 4,000 Jews. At Easter, the pilgrims often amount to 5,000. There are sixty-one Christian convents, of which the Armenian is the largest.

All that remains now of this once splendid city is a Turkish walled town, including a number of heavy, unornamented stone houses, with two and three ruined hex and vacant spaces, seated amid rugged hills, on a stony and forbidding soil,—not a cemetery in the midst of a desert. Jerusalem is, in fact, no more; what exists on its site seems only to mislead topographical inquiries. Not a monument of Jewish times is standing; the very course of the walls is changed, and the boundaries of the ancient city are become doubtful. The monks prefer to show the sites of the sacred places; but neither Calvary nor the holy sepulchre, much less the Dolomus Way, the house of Caiaphas, &c. have the slightest pretensions to even a probable identity with the real locality to which the tradition refers.

The general aspect of the country in the immediate neighborhood of Jerusalem is blighted and barren: "the bare rocks look through the scanty sward, and the grain seems in doubt whether to come to maturity or to die in the ear." On approaching the city from the W. toward the Jaffa, or Servian's gate, little is to be seen but the crenellated walls and the gothic citadel, the greater part of the town being concealed in the hollow formed by the slope of the ground toward the east. But from the high ground in the road to Nablous and Damascus, where the distant city first bursts on the traveller, the view is exceedingly noble and picturesque. Amid a seemingly magnificent assemblage of domes, and towers, and minarets, it is said, the eye rests with delight on the elegant proportions of the minaret of the great mosque, and the beautiful green blue color of the mosque of Omar, occupying the site of the temple of Jehovah; while, on the left, the lovely slope of mount Olivet forms a soothing feature in the landscape. The general character is a sort of forlorn magnificence; but the distant view is all.

On entering the Damascus gate, meanness, and filth, and misery, soon reveal its fallen and degraded state. The traveller is lost among narrow, unpaved, deserted streets, where a few paltry shops expose to view nothing but wretchedness; the houses are dirty and dull, looking like prisons or sepulchres; scarcely a creature is to be seen in the streets or at the gates; and throughout the whole city there is not one symptom of either commerce, comfort, or happiness. "How doth the city sit solitary, that was full of people! How is she become as a widow! she that was great among the nations, and princess among the people; how is she become tributary! From the daughter of Zion all her beauty is departed. All that pass by say, Is this the city that was called the perfection of beauty, the joy of the whole earth?"

But even that distant view of the modern town, which has been pronounced so exceedingly beautiful, is revolting to the mind; for what can reconcile the feelings of a protestant Christian to the monstrous mingling of Turkish domes and minarets towering over the site of the temple, and the triumphant symbol of the Mohammedan imposture glittering amid the towers of convents and churches dedicated to fraud and idolatry? The features of nature, however, possess an unchangeable interest; and it is on these, not on the pretended holy places and intrusive shadows, that the eye reposes with complacency; with these it is that the heart communes. "The beautiful gate of the temple," remarks Dr. Clarke, "is no more; but Siloa's fountain lately flows, and Cedron sometimes murmurs in the valley of Jehoshaphat." A few gardens still remain on the sloping base of mount Zion, watered from the pool of Siloam. The gardens of Gethsemane, the vale of Fatness, are in a sort of ruined cultivation; the olive is still found growing spontaneously in patches at the foot of the mount to which it has given its name; there, too, the road to Bethany still winds round the declivity, and mount Olivet still retains a languishing verdure.

To Jerusalem the attention of various societies has been directed, as furnishing favorable opportunities for the distribution of the Scriptures and of tracts.

Mr. Nicolayson, of the London Jews' society, in company with Mr. S. Farmer, Mr. Culman, a Jewish convert, and captain Cotton, an English officer, visited Jerusalem in the spring of 1833. Subsequently Mr. Nicolayson, in company with the Rev. W. M. Thomson, of the A. B. C. F. M., repaired to the holy city, where they spent six weeks. Mr. Thomson is now stationed at Beyroot. The population of Jerusalem is thought to be increasing. Pilgrims resort thither in great numbers.

JESSORE; a town of Hindostan, in Bengal, capital of the district of Jessore, which extends into the Sunderbunds. It is 62 miles N. E. Calcutta. Lon. W. 89° 15', N. lat. 23° 7'.

A church was formed at this place through the instrumentality of the Bapt. M. S. in 1807, and visited monthly by one of the native teachers. Not only were many converted, but one individual was happily restored, and his wife and mother were baptized. In 1810, the church consisted of four branches, each about 30 miles' distance from the other; the whole comprehending an extent of country of little less than 100 miles in diameter. At this period four native brethren were stationed at these different branches, to assist Carapet in his indefatigable labors, which had been the means of greatly increasing the church. The Rev. Mr. Thomas afterwards occupied this station, in connexion with the natives. Additions were made to the number of believers, but some the brethren were compelled to exclude; who, happily, retained a sufficient knowledge of the gospel to keep them from relapsing into idolatry. One of them, in his last sickness, declared that his dependence for salvation was on Christ alone; and calling his wife, pressed her in the most earnest manner to renounce every other hope,—profring this, indeed, with so much earnestness, as almost to make it a condition of her inheriting the little property he possessed.

For the present state of the mission at Jessore, see SAHEBCTTY.

JEWS. After the Babylonish captivity, the Hebrews were called Jews, the greater part of the nation having remained in the middle and eastern provinces of the Persian empire, and only 42,360 men, with their families, principally of the tribes of the kingdom of Judah, having returned to their country, when permission was granted by Cyrus, (536 B. C.) Here the nation remained, though with many changes, till A. D. 70, when Jerusalem was taken by Titus, the Roman emperor. He burned the temple, demolished the city, and put to death or drove into slavery and exile all the population. One hundred and ten thousand Jews perished at the siege and during the destruction of Jerusalem. Egypt, the northern coast of Africa, and the Grecian cities were filled with exiles. They have since been found in all the nations of Christendom. At various times they have suffered grievous persecutions. In most countries they have been most unjustly deprived of their civil rights. There is no distinction whatever between Jews and Christians by the constitution of the United States, but, in some of the states, certain officers, as the governor, councillors, and representatives, are required to profess, under oath, their belief in the Christian religion. In May, 1830, an attempt was made in the parliament of England to remove the civil disabilities affecting the Jews, but was opposed by the ministry, and the question was lost. In France, the Jewish ministers are paid, by an ordinance of 1830, from the public chest, as the Catholic ministers are. In Germany, a number of Jews have lately abandoned the system of the rabbins, and performed divine worship in the German language, approaching that of the Christians. Hamburg is the seat of this society. By a ukase of March, 1817, important privileges were conferred on the Jews in Russia who embrace Christianity. Land is given to them gratuitously, where they may settle under the name of the "Society of Israelitish Christians." They are exempt from military service, and from taxes for 20 years. The following is an estimate of the number of Jews, taken from a late number of the German Weimar Geographical Almanac.

Russia and Poland	658,809	Total in Europe	1,918,053
Austria	453,324	In Asiatic Turkey	300,000
European Turkey	321,000	Arabia	200,000
Germany	138,000	Hindostan	100,000
Prussia	131,000	China	60,000
Netherlands	80,000	Other Asiatic countries	78,000
France	60,000	Total in Asia	738,000
Great Britain	12,000	Africa	504,000
Cracow	7,300	America	5,700
Other European countries	15,420	New Holland	50
Grand Total			3,165,753

Various societies are laboring for the conversion of the Jews. William G. Schauler is employed by the A. B. C. F. M. in Constantinople. He has taken two Jews into his service; one an inquirer, and the other a hopeful Christian. The London Jews' society have 30 boys in their school, and 37 girls. Nine students in the seminary are preparing to become missionaries. It has been voted to discontinue this institution. The number of missionary agents employed is forty-three, of whom thirteen are converted Jews. Rev. J. C. Reichardt still continues to reside over the institution for affording employment to baptized Jews. Rev. M. S. Alexander preaches to the Jews in an Episcopal chapel. Many Jews are now well acquainted with the doctrines of the New Testament. The pure Scriptures have been introduced into some Jewish schools, where formerly the Talmud only was used.

KAAWALOHA; a station of the A. B. C. F. M. on the island Hawaii, one of the Sandwich islands. It is now vacant.

Cochran Forbes, missionary, and wife, are now employed at Kaawaloa. Readers, 2,500. Communicants, 80. In the fall of 1832, 14 were received; 12 since pronounced, none admitted. Discipline is administered for using intoxicating drinks. The great thing wanted in the schools is competent teachers. This station lies 15 miles S. of Kalua, and embraces the whole range of coast from that to the south point of the island.

KALUA; a station of the A. B. C. F. M. on the island Hawaii. 154

The following extract describes a special revival of religion, which took place in the autumn of 1830.

"At our communion season on the 25th of October, seventeen were baptized and admitted to the church, among whom was John Adams, the governor of Hawaii. On this occasion it was judged that there were 3,000 people within and about the house. It was a day of deep and solemn interest, and one long to be remembered. The Lord was evidently in the midst of us with the influences of his Spirit, subduing the hearts of sinners, and sanctifying, strengthening, and cheering the souls of his people.

"From this period the attention became more general, and for three or four months past those who were from morning till night with inquirers after salvation. They came principally in companies of from ten and under to one hundred and more. To have conversed with them all individually, would have been impracticable. Generally one of them would give expression to his feelings as the sentiments of the whole, after which they were addressed on the plain, simple, fundamental truths of the gospel. In their confessions they would generally enumerate the crimes of which they had been guilty in their heathen state, the particulars of which the apostle, in his description of the Gentile nations, has accurately given in the first chapter of his epistle to the Romans. They would also state the opinions which they entertained respecting the missionaries on their arrival here, and how they had treated their instructions, and the word of God which has been put into their hands. We have heard, say they, with our ears, we have come to our mouths, the word of God as a mere novelty, or for the purpose of knowing more than others, supposing that this was all that was necessary for salvation, without at all thinking it a matter of personal concernment to attend to, believe, and obey the truth. But the Spirit of God has come into our hearts, and taught us that our hearts are as full of manner of wickedness as our lives have been of evil deeds. We have been living in darkness and in the shadow of death, and have come to be directed to the word of light and eternal life. The feelings of many have been those of sympathy merely; still we have grounds for believing that many also have sought the Lord in earnest, and have found him. During the period embraced in this letter, the Moral Society for males has increased to 2,500, and that of females to 2,600, and there continue to be frequent additions. A Sabbath school has also been established, composed of adults and children, which includes a considerable part of the congregation, in which the catechism, the ten commandments, and other parts of Scripture are taught. A godly number, it is believed, have been turned from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God, none of whom have as yet made a public profession. A few have been received to our select meeting, which now contains 77, exclusive of the members of the church, most of whom give evidence of piety."

Asa Thurston acted as Artisan, Bishop and their wives are now employed at Kailua. Readers, 1,900. Congregation, 700. There is at present no special attention to religion. Since the death of the late queen the current of popular feeling has been fast ebbing towards former customs. The most intelligent and influential people, however, stand firm.

KALAUHA: a new station of the A. B. C. F. M. on Molekai, one of the Sandwich Islands. Harvey R. Hitchcock, missionary.

KANDY: a Kingdom of Ceylon, containing about a fourth of the island, in the interior part towards the south. The country is mountainous, very woody on the frontiers, and difficult of access from the great quantity of jungle.

The central part consists of mountains cultivated to their summits, interspersed with villages, rivulets, and cattle fields of rice and other grain, well trodden foot-paths in all directions, and fruitful valleys, with groves of areka, jacca, and cocoa-nuts, limes, oranges, &c. In many parts of the interior, volcanoes have burst forth at different times; and the hills seem to possess the principle of those eruptions. Iron and other ores are to be met with; but the Kandians, for years past, have paid no attention to discovering or working any of the veins. The air is subject to heavy fogs by days at night, succeeded by incessantly hot and sultry weather by day; rain and thunder are also frequent and violent. The inhabitants use fire-arms and bows and arrows for weapons of offence. The king was long absolute; and he was clothed in all the state and splendor of other Asiatic princes, with the peculiar distinction of a crown. The tyrannical government of the last ruler, and his cruelties, were in the extreme; so that many of his subjects renounced his dominion, and fled to other parts of the island. In 1815, the British, in 1815, took up arms against him solely, promising security and protection to his subjects. They entered the capital, which was found deserted and stripped of all valuable property; and the king's retreat being soon known, he was taken prisoner, sent to Colombo, and thence to Vellore, where he is still in confinement. The conquest was bloodless on the part of the British, who, with the Kandian chiefs, settled in a treaty for deposing the king, and establishing his British majesty's government in the Kandian provinces.

Kandy, the capital, stands at the head and widest part of an extensive valley, in the midst of wooded hills and mountains, and is more regularly built than most Indian towns. The palace is a square of great extent, built of a kind of cement perfectly white, with stone gateways. The temples of Buddha and the gods are numerous; and that of Mijetza is the most venerable of any in the country, as it contains a precious relic, the tooth of Buddha. The houses that constitute the streets are all of clay, of one story, standing on a low terrace of clay; and are all thatched, except those of the chiefs, which are tiled. Kandy was entered by the British troops in 1803, the king and principal inhabitants having previously fled; but the expedition terminated in the massacre or imprisonment of the whole detachment.

In 1815, it was again entered, and with better success, as noticed in the preceding article. The town is nearly surrounded by the river Mahawelle, and an artificial lake, made by the late king; 65 miles E. N. E. Colombo. E. lon. 89° 47'. N. lat. 7° 18'.

The directors of the C. M. S. having determined on sending four clergymen to Ceylon, the Rev. Mr. Lambick was appointed to Kandy.

In a letter dated October 27, 1818, he says: "A few days ago, the governor, in the prospect of the rebellion, being speedily terminated, proposed returning to Colombo, and desired that I might be asked whether I would remain here after he had left; and on my signifying my assent, his excellency conferred on me the appointment of assistant chaplain to the forces in Kandy; which, as long as I retain it, will save the society my personal expenses."

In this situation, Mr. Lambick had continual calls of duty among his countrymen, and the best opportunities of studying Cingalese in its purity. He also established a large school on the national system. The Rev. Mr. Browning joined him in 1820; and on the arrival of an additional chaplain, Mr. Lambick retired from the office he had held to Cotta, on which occasion he received the thanks of the government for the exemplary attention which he had paid to the Europeans. Mr. Browning, however, continued his efforts at this station—conducting Cingalese services, visiting the gaol, in which from 60 to 70 prisoners were confined, and actively superintending five schools.

A school-house was opened with divine service on the 19th of January, 1826. Besides Sunday services, Mr. Browning has a Cingalese service on Wednesday evenings, and one in Portuguese on Thursday evenings. The attendants at public worship had previously been small; many of the scholars were kept away by their parents; few adult heathen could be prevailed on to attend; and of the prisoners, though some listen to the word, others are indifferent and callous; but he continues to avail himself of various opportunities to make known the gospel. Sickness having again disabled the chaplain, it devolved on Mr. Browning, early in the year 1826, to take such part of his duty as could be done without material injury to his own health.

The inhabitants of Kandy are composed of a variety of people, languages, and religions, Buddhists, Mohammedans, worshippers of Siva and of Vishnoo, Protestants, Roman Catholics. Mr. Browning, the missionary, has a few sincerely attached to him, several of whom have no secular connexion with the mission, who give pleasing evidence that they love the Savior and practise his commandments.

KARASS: a village in Asiatic Russia, at the northern base of mount Caucasus.

The Rev. Messrs. Jack, Patterson, and Galloway, from the Scottish M. S., commenced exertions here in 1802, with a view to introduce the gospel among the Tartars. Though for some time they had many difficulties and discouragements to encounter, yet they experienced evident tokens of the divine favor and protection, and great good has resulted from their persevering efforts. Soon after they had established themselves at Karass, the Russian government, in consequence of an urgent solicitation, gave a grant of land, of more than 14,000 acres, for the benefit of the mission, with certain immunities flattering to its future prospects. Native youths, slaves to the Circassians and Cuban Tartars, were early redeemed by the missionaries, and placed in schools, where they received instruction in the Turkish and English languages, and were taught the useful arts and the principles of Christianity. Among those who early embraced the religion, the Rev. Messrs. Katagory, who has rendered essential aid to the mission, and advocated its cause in the metropolis of England. In 1805, a reinforcement of missionaries, with a printing-press, was sent to this place. The New Testament, which had been translated into the Turkish language by the assiduous labors of Mr. Bainton, together with some tracts written by the Rev. Mr. Galloway, were immediately printed and circulated among the people. Some of the nobles, and the superiority of Christianity, renounced their former superstitions, to embrace it; while the confidence of others in the truth of their system was greatly shaken, among whom were some effendis, or doctors. One priest is said to have exchanged his Koran for the New Testament.

The directors of the S. M. S. have voted to relinquish the missions at Karass and Astrachan, partly from the inadequacy of funds, and partly from the little fruit which the missions have produced.

The German M. S. had also a station at Karass, which was increasing; and, in consequence, Mr. Fletnitzer was removed from the neighborhood of Odessa, to assist Mr. Lang. The latter has labored with success in the German congregations committed to him, and has itinerated with Mr. Galloway among the Tartar tribes. Speaking of these visits, he says: "In general, the more sensible among them acknowledged, and that on our side there is more truth than on theirs; but the great objection it is said, What is truth? Their indifference toward every serious thought can hardly be endured. There is not one that understandeth: there is none that seeketh after God. The missionaries have, however, lately contemplated the trial of a school among these people." Of Mascher, a second German congregation of which Mr. Lang has the care, he says: "In general, the more sensible among them, who belong to our congregation: with sure hope I am waiting for the day of their salvation. At my last visit to this people, I exclaimed more particularly into their real state; and oh, how delightful was it to my soul, to find many a precious plant in this garden of our God—in this otherwise barren field! What feelings of adoration and thanksgiving filled my breast, when I heard, during divine service, the sacrifices of prayer and praise rise with deep veneration to God Almighty from this newly awakened people! How lovely sounded the voice of the little children! And how many a heart exclaimed, O Lord, hear us! O Lord, have mercy upon us! The zeal among the school-children is very great. The spelling-book sent from Basle is already committed to memory; and it is with difficulty the parents can keep the children from school. The Lord's day is kept holy; dedicated to the exclusive worship of God the Father, and to the building up in our holy faith and religion. The defaults of few members of the congregation were noticed by the elders of the chapel, and reproved in Christian love, according to the gospel. The flourishing state of this church is the more interesting, as it is surrounded with numerous tribes of Tartars, to whom their Christian conversation, by the grace of God, may become a light to guide their feet into the way of peace."

The German missionaries at Karass are Lang and Hegele. Several German youths are under preparation as catechists for the Tartars. By very late intelligence, it seems that it has been determined to abandon this mission.

KAT RIVER; a settlement on the borders of Caffra, consisting chiefly of liberated Hottentots, more than 3,000 in number, living in 50 or 60 locations. Begun in 1820. James Read, missionary. Communicants, 200. Teachers, 100. Scholars, 500. The mission is in a state of great prosperity.

KAUAI: one of the Sandwich Islands. (See SANDWICH ISLANDS.) KERIKERI: a station of the C. M. S. in New Zealand, on a river which falls into the bay of Islands, on the west side; commenced in 1819. Alfred N. Brown, missionary, James Kemp, C. Baker, catechists, James Smith, printer.

The missionaries at Kerikeri in 1833 were James Kemp and C. Baker, and T. Chapman, catechist. This village, once the scene of human sacrifices and barbarous superstitions, now exhibits the tranquility of an English village. The little church is well filled with attentive worshippers, and the truths of the gospel declared to those who have themselves felt that the Lord is gracious. They have 20 baptized natives, of whom 12 are adult converts; and in their schools they have 53 males and females under instruction.

KHAMIESBERG; a station of the W. M. S., near the northern boundary of the Cape Colony, and S. of the Great Orange river. (See LIV FOUNTAIN.)

KHAREE; an outstation of the B. M. S., 50 miles S. of Calcutta, with two neighboring villages. There are four services on Sundays, and six on week days. Christian population, 200. The mission is in a prosperous state.

KHODON; an outstation of the L. M. S. in Siberia, 190 miles N. N. E. of Selenginsk, commenced in 1828. Edward Stallybrass, the missionary, has some interesting youths under his instruction, and avails himself of the opportunities which his situation offers to proclaim the gospel to the people, and manifests his philanthropic spirit by assisting them with advice and medical aid when sick.

Mr. Stallybrass, at Khodon, wisely assiduously engaged in forming the minds of the youth under his care in the principles of the gospel, has sustained a heavy loss in the death of his wife. Mrs. Stallybrass had by a residence of fifteen years among the people, for whose salvation she labored and prayed, acquired that knowledge of their language, habits, and character, which fitted her eminently for her station.

KIDDERPORE; a station of the L. M. S. near Calcutta. A La Croix, missionary. Services are held regularly on Sunday mornings and Tuesday evenings. There are four boys' schools, two of which have 70 scholars each; and one girls' school.

Preaching has been maintained more regularly than formerly at Kidderpore, and the natives appear to improve in grace and knowledge, and there is a growing desire to receive the truth. Mr. and Mrs. Piffard have returned to England on account of her ill health.

KISHNAGUR; an outstation of Burdwan, of the C. M. S. Haerentin, missionary. Together with Nuddea, there are five schools.

KINGSTON; a sect port of Jamaica, founded in 1693. It has been of late greatly extended, and has many handsome houses. It has two churches, one Episcopal, the other Presbyterian. Population, 10,000 whites; slaves, 17,000; people of color, 25,000; free negroes, 2,500. Lon. 76° 33' W., lat. 18° N. The B. M. S. has a mission here.

KISSEY; a town in the parish of St. Patrick, Sierra Leone colony, West Africa, about three miles E. Freetown.

The C. M. S. commenced its benevolent efforts here in 1816. By April 1, 1817, there were 131 converts, the Rev. C. T. Wenzel had the charge, at that time, of 304 negroes, of whom 74 males and 77 females attended school. On Mr. Wenzel's death, soon after, the Rev. G. R. Nylander, from the Bulom shore, and Stephen Caulker, a native usher, proceeded to this station. In 1819, Mr. Nylander gives the following account of his situation and labors:—

"I have family prayers, morning and evening, with about 800 adults and children; and, through the day, my time is taken up with the affairs of the settlement. On the Lord's day, there is a congregation of 300 or more assembled; but none, as yet, seem to have ears to hear or hearts to understand. However, seeing so many precious souls assembled before me, I am often refreshed in speaking to them, and encouraged to continue in the work; though sometimes much dejected because I see no fruit, as others do."

In 1822, the number of inhabitants being greatly increased, Mr. Nylander says: "Divine service is attended on Sundays by 600 people and upward; and about 400 attend morning and evening prayers on week days. About 60 mechanics attend evening school; 100 boys and 100 girls are at the day schools; a few married women attend, but very irregularly." In October, a M. A. was formed, when four pounds six shillings and nine pence was collected, and the subsequent monthly collections were pleasing.

In March, 1826, Mr. Metzger reported that the people were very negligent about spiritual things, few besides the communicants attending the ministry of the word.

The following is the report for Kissey in 1823: Average attendance Sunday morning, 680. Evening, 400. Week-day evening, 300. Communicants, 111. Candidates for baptism, 78. Baptisms, 36. Day scholars, 333. Sunday, 277. The progress of the children in learning is satisfactory.

KOHALA; an outstation on Hawaii, under the care of the A. B. C. F. I.

KOMAGGAS; a station of the L. M. S. on the frontier of Little Namaqualand, within the Cape Colony, about 22 days' journey from the Cape. Commenced in 1828. J. H. Schuelen, missionary.

The gospel is preached almost daily at Komaggas; the people appear desirous to hear, and the school is well attended.

KORNEGALLE; the chief town in the Seven Korles, or districts, of the Kandian territory, about 25 miles N. W. of Kandy, and 60 N. E. of Colombo. Early in 1821, the Rev. Mr. Newstead, of the W. M. S., was enabled, by permission of the lieutenant-governor, and by the friendly offices of Henry Wright, Esq. the resident, to commence here a missionary establishment.

On the first Sabbath day after his arrival, he preached in an unfinished bungalow, intended for a temporary hospital. Sir E. Barnes having immediately arrived, he was waited upon by Mr. Newstead, who was informed that he might build upon any place he deemed eligible; and a piece of ground about 600 feet in circumference was therefore allotted for that purpose.

"Here is," said Mr. Newstead, "a garrison of 200 soldiers, many officers and European children; houses are building, and streets forming, every day; a rest-house is also to be immediately built, and new churches are to be erected; hence it is easy to see the station is one of growing importance. Schools have been opened, and we have gained admission on a very friendly footing to two Buddhist temples in the neighborhood. The most interesting fact, however, is, that a small company have begun to learn the English language in the house of a Buddhist priest, contiguous to his temple; himself being one of the scholars, and at his own request." The temple-school arose from a conversation with the priest, who solicited instruction; I, of course, assented, and proposed a small school at his house, which our teacher should visit every day. In the afternoon of the same day I had the priest's house ornamented with large English alphabets, spelling and reading lessons, &c., and several young Kandian students were seated on their mats round our schoolmaster, who continues to visit them every day.

In 1826, it is said,— "The prospects of usefulness in the Seven Korles are as encouraging as can be expected in a country professedly heathen, considering the confined means possessed of communicating religious instruction during the past year. The few members of society we have in that district being schoolmasters, are necessarily separated much from each other, and seldom are able to meet in class; but it is hoped that by their Christian conduct and conversational willingness to consider the truths of our holy religion has been induced among the natives. Although much ground may not have been gained during the year, yet it is satisfactory to know that none has been lost, but that some progress is perceptible."

The missionary at Kornegalle in 1833 was Thomas Kilmer; two native assistants; 136 members; 19 schools.

KOTTEGERRY; a village on the Nilberly hills, in Southern India. Lat. 11° 19' N. It is 15 miles from the foot of the hills, and 6,500 feet high. It is a place of great salubrity, where invalids from the missions resort.

KURNAUL; a station of the C. M. S. 70 miles N. of Delhi. Commenced in 1827. Anand Messche, native catechet. Anand is actively engaged in teaching, preaching, and distributing the Scriptures. His knowledge of medicine is of much service to him. About 30 scholars attend on him.

KUTTALAM; a village in the Tinnevely district, South India, where there is a school, visited by the missionaries of the C. M. S., containing 61 children.

LABRADOR; an extensive country in North America, situated on the N. E. part of New Britain; bounded W. by Hudson's bay; N. by Hudson's straits; E. by Davis' straits, the Atlantic, and the straits of Belleisle; and S. by the gulf of St. Lawrence and Lower Canada. Between 53° and 70° W. lon. and 50° and 63° N. lat. The number of the inhabitants has not been accurately ascertained; it has been estimated at about 6,000. The exports are fish, whalebone, and furs; the latter of which are of superior quality.

The first idea of sending out missionaries to the Esquimaux appears to have originated in a conjecture that a national affinity subsisted between those people and the Greenlanders; and though the excellent and devoted Matthew Stach did not succeed in his application to the Hudson's Bay company for permission to attempt the evangelization of the Indians belonging to their factories, a ship was fitted out in 1752, by some of the U. B. and several other merchants, for the purpose of trading on the coast of Labrador. Four missionaries sailed from London on the 17th of May, taking with them the frame and materials of a house, a boat, various kinds of seeds, and different implements of agriculture; and, on their arrival in a fine bay, they went on shore, and fixed up a spot for their future residence, to which they gave the name of "Hopewell;" but the painful circumstances occurring, the mission was for a time abandoned.

Jens Haven, however, sailed for Labrador in May, 1765, accompanied by C. L. Drachart, formerly one of the Danish missionaries in Greenland, and two other brethren.

A tract of land in Esquimaux Bay was afterwards granted, by an order of council, for the establishment of a mission; and a brig, of about 120 tons burthen, was purchased, with the design of annually visiting Labrador, and trading with the natives. In the month of May, 1770, Messrs. Haven, Drachart, and Jensen, sailed from England, in order to explore the coast, and to fix on a convenient situation for a settlement. On their arrival they availed themselves of the first opportunity of preaching; and, notwithstanding the grant which they had previously obtained, they deemed it advisable to purchase from the savages the piece of ground which they intended to occupy as a missionary station. They then returned to England to make a farther preparation for the accomplishment of their benevolent design.

The interest excited by an attempt to introduce the cheering light of revelation among the wretched and benighted Esquimaux was very great, and several members of the Moravian church, both male and female, avowed their willingness to abandon all the comforts of civilized society, and to expose themselves to every species of inconvenience and privation, for the furtherance of so important an object. Accordingly, in the spring of 1771, a company of 14 persons, comprising three married couples, a widower, and seven single brethren, sailed for Labrador; and after a tedious and hazardous voyage, arrived on the 9th of August at their place of destination. The day after their arrival, they took possession of the spot which had been purchased in the preceding summer, and gave it the appellation of Nain. They also immediately commenced the erection of a mission-house, the frame and materials of which they had brought from England; but great exertions were required to complete it before the commencement of winter, which, in these northern regions, is so intensely cold, that rain, placed in the open air, freezes like water, and rectified spirits in a short time become as thick as oil.

The conduct of the Esquimaux had been uniformly friendly towards them from their first arrival; and as the brethren acted, upon all occasions, in the most open and ingenuous manner, entire confidence was soon established between them. In former times, no European could have passed a night among these savages, then characterized as thieves and murderers, without the most imminent danger; but now the missionaries, regardless of the inclemency of the season, travelled across the ice and snow to visit them in their winter houses, and were hospitably entertained for several days and nights successively. These visits were afterwards returned; and in consequence of the friendly intercourse thus opened, the natives not only asked the advice of the brethren in all difficult cases, but even chose them as umpires in their disputes, and invariably submitted to their arbitration. They also listened with silence and attention to the preaching of the gospel; and, in a few instances, the hope was entertained that impressions were made which might, at a subsequent period, be productive of some fruit to the honor of the Redeemer.

A man named Anauke, however, who had been formerly a ferocious and desperate character, was at length induced to attend the preaching of the brethren. After hearing them repeatedly, he pitched his tent in their settlement in 1772, and remained there till the month of November, when he removed to his winter house. Even then his anxiety for further instruction in the things of God was so great, that he actually returned on foot, for the purpose of spending a few days more with the heralds of the cross; though the Esquimaux were never accustomed to travel in that manner; and in summer they pass from one place to another in their kajaks, and in winter they perform their journeys in sledges. From the time of his second departure, the missionaries heard nothing of him till February, 1773, when his wife came to Nain, stating that he had died, calling on the name of the Lord Jesus. Though no Christian friend was present to direct or influence him, he would not permit one of the angekuks, who he considered as his spiritual father, to come near him; but committed himself unreservedly into the hands of that great Physician who descended from heaven to bind up the broken hearted, and with whom he was enabled to hold sweet communion even when heart and flesh were failing. After his demise, this person was invariably spoken of by the natives as "the man whom the Savior took to himself."

In the summer of 1775, in compliance with the instructions which they had received from Europe, Messrs. Haven and Jensen set out with the design of commencing a new settlement at a place called Okkak, about 150 miles to the northward of Nain. As this spot appeared peculiarly eligible for the purposes of a mission, being abundantly furnished with wood and fresh water, contiguous to an excellent haven, and surrounded by a numerous population of the heathen, the brethren were immediately put on shore, and as soon as they had taken up their residence here, and began to preach the glad tidings of salvation to the natives in the vicinity. At first they met with much discouragement; but at length some indications of success began to appear; and in 1781, they had the satisfaction of ministering among 35 persons who had been baptized in the faith of Christ, besides ten others, who, as catechumens, were receiving peculiar instruction.

In the month of August, 1782, the brethren proceeded to form a third settlement, at a place to the southward of Nain, to which they gave the appellation of Hopedale. This spot had been formerly reconnoitred, and considered particularly suitable for a missionary station; and it was now hoped that great numbers of the Esquimaux would rejoice in the opportunity of receiving religious instruction. This pleasing anticipation was, for the present, disappointed; and for several years the preaching of the gospel on this spot appeared to be attended with so little success, that both the missionaries and the directors in Europe felt inclined to relinquish such an unprofitable station. The great Head of the church, however, had otherwise determined, and Hopedale, in the sequel, became the scene of an awakening which afterwards extended its blessed influence to the settlement, and constrained the friends of the Redeemer to exclaim, "What hath God wrought!"

At the commencement of 1804, the missionaries were much discouraged on a review of the small success which seemed to have attended their faithful ministrations among the heathen in Labrador; but before the end of that year, it was their privilege to behold the dawn of a brighter day, and to witness effects which they were aware could only have been produced by the agency and influence of the Holy Spirit.

On the 9th of August, 1820, the missionaries at Nain had the satisfaction of seeing the new ship called the Harmony come to an anchor in their bay, just 59 years after the first vessel arrived there, with 11 brethren and sisters on board, with the view of forming a Christian settlement in a land which, previously to that period, had been covered with thick darkness. They endeavored, therefore, to express their joy, by hoisting two small flags, and a white one, on which some of the sisters had formed the number 50 with red riband, and surrounded it with a wreath of laurel. Their small cannon were also discharged, and answered by the guns of the ship, and the Esquimaux fired their muskets as long as their powder lasted. Some tunes of hymns expressive of thanksgiving for divine mercies were, in the mean time, played on wind instruments; which altogether made a suitable impression on the minds of the converts, and afforded them a tolerable idea of a jubilee, rejoicing. The missionary, Kohlmeister, explained to them that the number on the flag was intended to denote that this was the fiftieth time that a ship had come safely to the settlement for their sakes, and that the gracious preservation which had been afforded during that long period was the cause of their rejoicing. They listened to this with profound attention and then exclaimed, "Yes! Jesus is worthy of thanks! Jesus is worthy of thanks indeed!"

The jubilee of the mission was also celebrated in the other settlements with due solemnity, and many of the Esquimaux afterwards observed that it had been a most important and blessed season to their souls.

The most important benefits appear to have resulted from the translation and printing different parts of the New Testament in the Esquimaux language; and the contributions which the people made of seals' blubber is a striking illustration of their gratitude.

The brethren wrote from Hopedale, July 27, 1825:—"We have, indeed, even in the year past, richly experienced that the good seed has not been sown in vain. The Spirit of God accompanied the testimony of the life, sufferings, and death of Jesus, with the hearts of our people; and we enjoy with them many rich blessings, whenever we meet in his name. It gave us peculiar satisfaction to perceive, that all those who had for some time past been excluded from the congregation, returned with true signs of repentance, bemoaning their sins and transgressions, and crying to the Lord for mercy. We could, therefore, at different opportunities, readmit them all to fellowship with the believers.

"In externals we have cause to thank our heavenly Father for his care for his poor children. Though few seals were caught by our Esquimaux during the last autumn and winter, they never suffered real want. The reindeer hunt turned out well, and many partridges were shot in the country; so that we could always procure a good supply of fresh meat. Towards the end of spring, the Esquimaux were remarkably successful in catching seals, which enabled them to dry a considerable stock of meat. We had little snow during the winter; but from the 24th of November to the 9th of June, this year, our bay was frozen."

On August 13, 1825, the missionaries wrote from Nain:—"The internal state of our Esquimaux congregation has, by the Lord's mercy, afforded us more joy than pain. Most of the baptized have been desirous of experiencing the power of our Savior's grace, to enable them to walk worthy of the gospel, and to give honor to him who has delivered them from darkness and the power of sin. Some painful occurrences may be expected; for the enemy of souls is ever active, seeking to do harm for the cause of God. Nor has he spared us, but has sought to lead the children into mischief, and create disturbance among them."

In a letter dated Okkak, August 24, 1825, it is said:—"Since the departure of the ship last year, 9 children and 13 adults were baptized; 13 become partakers of the Lord's supper; 3 youths were received into the congregation. 23 persons came to us here, desiring to be converted to the Lord; a family of 6 persons removed to Nain; 7 adults and 3 children departed this life. They all gave evidence of their faith, and expressed their desire to depart and be with Christ. Our congregation consists of 338 persons, of whom 97 are communicants."

In August, 1830, the missionary from Hopedale writes:—"The word of the cross, which we preach, has in the past year penetrated into the hearts of most of those who heard it. Few have remained indifferent, and we have perceived with joy that many have found it in the doctrine of Christ's atonement salvation and deliverance from sin. Some young people who as yet turn a deaf ear to the exhortations given continue in a wayward course, and we wait with patience for the time when the good Shepherd will find them, and bring them to his fold. In our studies I devote his pleasure to see the children making considerable progress, but some of the older ones learn very slowly. Those in the first class can read well and turn to Scripture texts and hymns with great facility."

The stations of the Brethren in Labrador are 4; 29 missionaries; 874 Esquimaux converts, of whom 319 are converts. (See NAIN, OKKAK, HOPEDALE, and HEBRON.)

LAGEBA, one of the Feejee islands: 18° S. lat., 178° W. lon. The L. M. S. commenced a mission on this island in 1826. Three native teachers are employed. They were all well received, but the king declined to profess Christianity until he had consulted the chiefs of the different islands.

LAHAINA; a station of the A. B. C. F. M. on the island of Maui, one of the Sandwich islands.

The missionaries at Lahaina are William Richards, Lorrin Andrews, and Ephraim Spaulding, and their wives; Alonso Chapin, M. D., physician, and wife; Maria C. Ogden. Readers, 1818. The first session of the high school at Lahaina commenced July 2, 1833. In the course of the year there were 91 scholars. Great embarrassments have been experienced by Mr. Andrews, the principal, for want of school books. The native preaching devolves principally on Mr. Richards. Mr. Starkweather devotes his attention very much to the improvement of common schools. Except while the ships were recruiting here, he had devoted 5 days in a week to school keeping. Dr. Chapin resides near the shore that he may attend to calls from the natives, and from ships, as well as from the missionaries. Communicants, 188. The school under the care of Miss Ogden is flourishing.

LA POINTE; a station of the A. B. C. F. M. in lake Superior, among the Ojibwas. Sherman Hall, missionary; John Campbell, mechanic, and their wives. Delia Cook and Sabrina Stevens, assistants. (See OKIBWAS.)

LATTAKAWA; a city and capital of the Matchapee tribe, about 730 miles north-east of Cape Town, South Africa. In June, 1813, the Rev. John Campbell, of Kingsland, visited this place, with the hope of obtaining permission to send missionaries to that part of South Africa. After waiting a considerable time for an interview with the king, Matebec, and overruling his objections, the king said:—"Send instructors, and I will be a father to them."

Encouraged by this assurance, the directors of the L. M. S. sent out 4 missionaries, Messrs. Evans, Hamilton, Williams, and Barker, in February, 1814. On their arrival, Matebec and several of his people shook hands with them with great cordiality, supposing them to have been traders come for the purpose of exchanging goods; but on finding that they were the missionaries promised by Mr. Campbell, the king appeared much chagrined, some of his captains seemed to express their disapprobation, and in their feelings the people encouraged.

Deeply grieved by this unexpected disappointment, the brethren returned to Grievia Town. Mr. Read was, however, resolved to attempt the establishment of a mission; and on doing so he proceeded thither with 7 wagons, and a number of persons of different nations. On their arrival, Matebec appeared very cool, and repeated his former observations with respect to the ancient customs of the Boothchuans, and their aversion to instruction. "To these objections," says Mr. Read, "I gave little heed; but told him that in conformity to the agreement with Mr. Campbell, the good people of the country beyond the great water had sent missionaries; that they had rejoiced at his having promised to receive such, and had sent by them a variety of articles to make him and his people happy. Matebec now seemed satisfied, and said we might unyoke our oxen under a large tree which stands near his house; and two days afterwards, on his being asked where we should get wood and reeds for building, and where we should build, he replied that we should find wood and reeds at hand, and that we might build where we pleased."

Mateeba's mind was deeply affected by a defeat he experienced about this time; and he not only acknowledged that he had done wrong in refusing to listen to the advice of the missionaries, who attempted to dissuade him from war, but declared that, in future, he would be guided by their directions.

On the 25th of April, Mr. and Mrs. Hamilton arrived at Lattakoo, and were very kindly received by the king, who told them that they must consider his country as their own, and spend the remainder of their lives with his people.

On the 4th of June, the missionaries, in compliance with the wish of the king, removed to the Krooman river; and on the 8th arrived at the place of their destination, which appeared to be well situated for a permanent settlement. "The plain," says one of the brethren, "is as large as the city of London, and surrounded by lofty trees, which afford a delightful shade in the summer, and give it a very pleasing appearance." On this occasion they were accompanied by Mateeba and several of his chiefs, who went with them in order to determine on the spot where the new town should be built. Many of the chiefs were extremely averse both to the king's removal and to his protection of the missionaries. Mateeba, however, declared his determination of acting according to the dictates of his own judgment; and observed, that the brethren had evinced their attachment towards him by regularly attending to dress his wounds, after his own captains had left him sick and wounded in the field, to be devoured by the birds of prey.

On the 12th of New Lattakoo, March 1818, one of the missionaries observed,—"Things are going on better here than we expected in so short a time, as we have no longer any opposition from the Boochuanas; but, on the contrary, some of them are thanking God for sending his word among them, and praying that we may never leave them."

In March, 1820, the Rev. John Campbell paid a visit to New Lattakoo, and had the satisfaction of finding that a commodious place of worship had been built, capable of containing about 400 persons, and a long row of missionary houses, with excellent gardens behind; a neat fence, composed of reeds, had also been placed in front of the houses, which tended to improve the general appearance; and the name of Burder's Kooe was given to the new buildings, as a token of respect to the late respected secretary of the L. M. S.

The M. M. churches, who constitute one of the most numerous tribes of the interior, are extremely fond of attending to their worship, and have been induced to plant any, because nothing of the kind appears to have been cultivated by their forefathers, to whose customs and manners they are as strongly attached as the Hindoos or the disciples of Mohammed.

The exertions of the missionaries to form a school had hitherto been attended with little success; as the children seemed to consider that they were conferring an obligation on them by attending to their instructions, and that their attendance ought to be remunerated every day, either by a supply of victuals or presents of beads, &c. The same feeling, also, prevailed among many of the adults, with respect to coming under the sound of the gospel; so that when a captain was ordered to attend regularly for a short time, who had not previously been in the habit of hearing the word, the missionaries generally anticipated an early application for the loan of their wages, or their plough, or something which he particularly wished to obtain.

Notwithstanding these discouragements, however, Mr. Campbell found that some of the young people had paid considerable attention to the instruction of the missionaries, and had evidently profited by them.

Previous to his final departure, a poor female Matchapee called on him and said, that when she first heard of the Bible she did not think it was true, but when she found it describe her heart so exactly she could not but believe what it said. She was determined, she added, always to live near some place where the word of God was preached, and where she might hear about a crucified Savior, even though she night starve.

After the removal of Mr. Campbell the missionaries continued their labors among the Boochuanas, preaching, catechizing, and conversing with them. The attendance at public worship, however, fluctuated extremely; the number of hearers being sometimes very considerable, and at other times very small. Mr. Moffat occasionally itinerated among the neighboring kraals, where, as in the town, his congregations varied considerably as to numbers, and the people listened to his message with more or less attention.

In 1823, the following very interesting scenes occurred at this station, as related by the missionaries.

"About eight months ago, Aaron Joseph, who had removed to this station for no other purpose but to get his children educated, and to acquire for himself the knowledge of writing, was soon afterwards aroused to a sense of his awful state by nature. Being able to read, and possessing a tolerably extensive knowledge of divine things, it was the wish of his friends to direct him to the Lamb of God who taketh away the sins of the world. About three months ago, he became a candidate for baptism. On Sabbath last, he and his three children were publicly baptized. The scene was very impressive, and more easily conceived than described. Our meeting-house was, as usual, too small for the congregation. It was with difficulty that order could be maintained, owing to the noise and cries of many who felt the deepest interest in what they saw and heard. Aaron's wife, who is a respectable and industrious woman, and who had for a long time stifled conviction, could now no longer restrain the pangs of a guilty conscience. An old Hotentot, (Yonker Swartboy,) and a Mochuan who had apostatized, when at the old station, saw the enormity of their guilt, and were cut to the heart. The former, in particular, for a time seemed inconsolable. On Monday next we held our missionary prayer meeting. The attendance was great, and the whole scene, in its most affecting scene. Many, independent of every remembrance, were unable to restrain their feelings, and wept aloud, so that the voice of prayer and singing was lost in that of weeping. It became impossible for us to refrain from tears of gratitude to our indulgent Savior, for having thus far vouchsafed some tokens of his presence and blessing. These things are not confined to the walls of the sanctuary. Sometimes three or four at a time are waiting at our houses for counsel and instruction. For some time past, the sounds which predominate in our village are those of singing, prayer, and weeping. Many hold prayer meetings from house to house, and occasionally to a very late hour; and oft before the sun is seen to gild the horizon they will assemble at some house for prayer, and continue till it is time to go forth to labor. It has often happened lately, that before the bell has rung, the half of the congregation was assembled at the doors.

In 1833, the missionaries at Lattakoo were Robert Moffat and John Baillia. Robert Hamilton and Rogers Edwards, assistants. The attendance on the means of grace is good. The missionaries visit in rotation, every Sunday, with encouragement, a number of villages lower down the Kuruman, and pay a monthly visit to old Lattakoo, where a great number of natives have assembled. The printing press, church, and school, prosper. The French missionaries visit old Lattakoo every Sunday.

LEECH LAKE; a station among the Ojibwas on the Upper Mississippi, first occupied by William T. Boutwell, of the A. B. C. F. M. LETTY; a station of the N. M. S. in the Eastern Archipelago, where Mr. Le Brun has labored with much effect.

LEICESTER TOWN; a hamlet of liberated negroes, 4 miles from Freetown, West Africa. It is the oldest of those settlements, having been formed in 1809.

In 1816, a school was established here by the C. M. S., and the missionaries have labored with some success.

The number of communicants at Leicester in 1833 was 14. Day scholars, 19; evening, 50; congregation, 80. A favorable opinion is expressed of the station.

LIBERTY, the project of colonizing the free people of color in the United States seems to have had its origin in Virginia. About thirty years since, the legislature of that state passed a resolution requesting governor Moore, since president of the United States, to correspond with the general government on the subject of establishing a colony in Africa. In 1816, a resolution expressing cordial approbation of the measure passed the legislature with but eight dissenting voices. General Moore, who at that time had been long discussed in secret council, and revolved in the inmost meditations of a few distinguished men, and that the news, in 1817, that it was maturing, brought with it the first ray of light upon a subject which his own mind had been long and deeply pondering. As early as 1787, Dr. Thornton, of Washington, proposed the subject to the people of color residing in Boston and Providence, and induced many to consent to accompany him in a proposed expedition. But the community refused to furnish the means, and the enterprise failed.

In 1816, the Rev. Mr. Finley, of New Jersey, whose mind had long been occupied with this subject, visited Washington, and immediately began to make arrangements preparatory to a meeting of the citizens. He conversed with president Moore, the heads of departments, and with many members of congress. The zeal and ability with which he pleaded the cause had considerable influence in collecting people to the meeting. The evening before, a small circle met to supplicate the blessing of the Most High upon the undertaking. Samuel J. Mills arrived at Washington just in time to attend this meeting. The society was hardly organized before Dr. Finley was summoned from the prosecution of his loved enterprise to his eternal reward.

The first object of the society was to procure information in regard to the most suitable place for the establishment of a colony. For this purpose Messrs. Mills and Burgess visited Africa, in behalf of the society. About five weeks, at the commencement of the year 1818, were employed in surveying the coast to the south of Sierra Leone, as far as to the island Sherbro. Several conversations were held with the native chiefs on the subject of purchasing land, and much valuable knowledge was obtained. The home of the passage Mr. Mills died. Not the least among the important objects which were accomplished by this enterprise was the excitement of a powerful sympathy in this country in favor of a cause to which the noble spirit of Mills had fallen a sacrifice. Public attention was awakened, and the treasury of the society was so much replenished, that it was determined to fit out an expedition as speedily as possible. In consequence of the representations of the agents, the government of the United States determined to establish an agency on the African coast, for the purpose of providing an asylum for recaptured slaves; and that it should be located at the place where the society should establish a colony. Early in 1820, the Elizabeth sailed from the United States, with its two agents on the part of the government, and one in behalf of the society, and eighty emigrants. This ill-planned expedition arrived in the midst of the rainy season, and was landed, through the treachery of some of the native chiefs, on the island Sherbro, one of the most unhealthy spots that could have been selected. The agents and 24 settlers were soon swept away. The surviving colonists experienced a complication of sufferings. The news of these events, though disastrous in the extreme, did not discourage the fast friends of the society. Early in 1821, 28 emigrants, under the direction of four agents, joined the wretched remains of the settlers at Sherbro. In obedience to orders, the whole were removed to Sierra Leone, and placed under the protection of the British government. The agents sailed down the coasts and made several fruitless attempts to purchase land of the natives. Two very soon fell victims to the fever of the climate, and a third returned to the United States. The slave-trade was the source of these failures to purchase land. The people of the Bassa country were perfectly willing to receive their brethren from the United States, but on no consideration would they consent to renounce the slave-trade.

In the spring of 1821, Dr. Eli Ayres was appointed agent of the society. Soon after his arrival, in company with lieutenant Stockton of the Alligator, he proceeded down the coast from Sierra Leone. On the 15th of December, they succeeded in purchasing a tract, embracing the whole of cape Montserado, and a most valuable tract of land, on a river that bears the name of the Alligator.

We have never seen any negotiation with the Indians of this country, admirable as some have been for fact and talent, which could be compared, for perfect knowledge of human nature and unconquerable perseverance, with the negotiation of lieutenant Stockton and Dr. Ayres.

Cape Montserado lies in about the sixth degree of north latitude. The territory first purchased presents a form of a tongue of land, twelve leagues in extent, joined to the main land by a narrow isthmus, formed by the approach of the head waters of the Montserado and Junk rivers. The north-western termination of this narrow tract of country is cape Montserado, rising towards its extremity into a bold and majestic promontory. The Montserado river is 300 miles in length, being the largest African river from the Rio Grande to the Congo.

Early in the year 1822, measures were taken to transport the settlers from Sierra Leone to the cape. In consequence of the refusal of the natives to permit a landing, a small island was purchased lying at the mouth of the river Montserado, and temporarily occupied. At length a secret arrangement was made with king George, who resided on the cape, in virtue of which the settlers were permitted to remove from the island, and commence clearing the heavy forest for the site of a town. But their happy anticipations were soon overcast. An English schooner having been stranded about a mile from the extremity of the cape, king George's people immediately rushed out to seize the plunder. The Americans were summoned to the assistance of their English visitors. After a sharp skirmish the assailants were compelled to retire. During the engagement, fire from a field-piece was unhappily communicated to the storehouse, and provisions, ammunition, &c., were consumed to the amount of $3000. By these unhappy dissensions the minds of the natives were exceedingly exasperated. Two boats, which the colonists had despatched up the river to procure fresh water, were fired upon, on their return, and two persons were killed.

But in this day of gloom, God interposed for their deliverance. Boatswain, a chief of great power and influence among the surrounding tribes was induced to interpose his authority for the settlement of difficulties. He immediately appeared on the Montserado, and as he said, he pronounced the sentence, No justice. Having assembled the various parties and ascertained the prominent facts, he laconically remarked to the hostile tribes, "Let the Americans have their lands immediately. Whoever is not satisfied with my decision, let him tell me so." Then turning to the agent he said, "If they oblige me to come again to quiet them, I will do it to purpose, by taking their heads from their shoulders, as I did old king Goro's on my last voyage." The settlers were exceedingly gratified by the result of the cape. But as it was supposed that the cloud had dispersed only to collect again its fury, the agent came forward with a proposal to re-embark the settlers and convey them back to Sierra Leone. A small number accepted the proposal. Twenty-one persons only, capable of bearing arms, remained behind. The rains had now set in with uncommon violence; the houses were destitute of roofs, and the store of provisions was almost exhausted, but the persevering agents would admit of no other place than a parallel with the Plymouth pilgrims, they soon provided themselves with comfortable houses, and prepared as fully as possible against the adverse circumstances which were soon to overtake them. About this time both the agents returned to the United States.

On the 8th of August, the brig Strong, from Baltimore, with 55 emigrants, and Mr. J. Ashmun, joint agent of the society and the government, arrived at the cape. Mr. Ashmun immediately proceeded to survey the military strength of the colony, as from many appearances an attack was anticipated. In consequence of fatigue and exposure to heavy rains, a large number of the emigrants were wholly disabled. Mr. Ashmun for a long time was subjected to extreme suffering and very frequently to delirium. His amiable and affectionate wife died on the 15th of September.

Secret meetings now began to be held by the native kings, at which many hostile measures were proposed and discussed. In the course of a few days, the native forces were known to be collecting from various quarters, and every possible preparation was made to place the colony in a state of defence. On the 11th of November, the enemy suddenly appeared from the woods, and at the distance of sixty yards fired a volley of musket balls, which great injury was done, and the colony's forces were thrown into confusion. The second discharge of a brass field-piece, however, brought the enemy to a stand; their fire suddenly terminated; a savage yell was raised, which echoed dismally through the surrounding forests, and they all vanished; four of the colonists were killed and four wounded. The carriage on the part of the enemy was great. An ineffectual attempt was now made to negotiate a peace. Efficient preparations were made against a renewed attack. In imitation of the pilgrims of New England, a day was set apart for fasting, humiliation, and prayer. On the 30th, the enemy appeared with a force of 1,500, and attacked the works, nearly at the same time, on opposite sides. But after receiving a few well directed shots from the large guns, they turned and fled.

An English schooner now arrived on the coast, having on board the celebrated African teacher, singing. Through his influence, the native chiefs were induced to sign an instrument, binding themselves to an unlimited truce with the colonists, and referring existing disputes to the arbitration of the governor of Sierra Leone. Much disinterested assistance was rendered by the British seamen, as well as by the officers and crew of the United States ship Cyane, which about this time visited the colony. On the 21th of May, 1823, the Oswego arrived at the cape with 61 colonists, who went out, notwithstanding that a full disclosure had been made to them before they sailed of the recent events which had occurred at the colony. In consequence of the little preparation which had been made for their reception, a fever soon commenced, and 8 persons fell victims to its ravages. A division of land was now made, a measure which greatly promoted the prosperity of the colony. Dr. Ayres, who went out in the Oswego, was compelled, through severe indisposition, to return to the United States and resign his commission.

On the 13th of February, 1824, the ship Cyrus arrived at Liberia, with 105 emigrants. Through the favor of Heaven, the fever, which visited them soon after their arrival, proved fatal in no case except those of three children. This band of emigrants exhibited a spirit of subordination, industry, and piety, which was attended with the happiest effects upon all the interests of the colony. A most important measure, which was accomplished through the united exertions of Mr. Ashmun and Mr. Gurley, who visited the colony during this summer, was the organization of an energetic government. By its operation the despondent were encouraged, the disorderly were quieted, and the whole state of affairs wore the aspect of peace and obedience. In September of this year, the colony enjoyed a special visitation of the influences of God's Holy Spirit. About 50 of the colonists, of all ages and characters, became pious, and most of them publicly professed their faith in the Redeemer. "To the days of eternity," remarks Mr. Ashmun, "a countless host of the children of Africa saved will look back and date from this event the first effectual dawning of that heavenly light, which shall at length have conducted them to the fold and city of God."

The next event of importance was the arrival of the brig Hunter with 67 emigrants. Near the close of the year 1826, an effort was made in New England to fit out an expedition. By the indefatigable exertions of the Rev. Horace Scasions, 34 emigrants were collected, a printing-press, printer, a valuable library, and large stores of provisions were procured. After they sailed from Boston, 18 of the emigrants were formed into a church; on their arrival at the colony, they were visited with an unprecedented mortality. About half the number, among whom were Mr. Force, the printer, Mr. Holton, an ordained missionary, and Mr. Sessions, were swept away. This disastrous calamity is in part to be attributed to the fact, that they left a cold region in the coldest part of the year, and that many of them arrived at Liberia in the hottest season of the year; and that, many of them most imprudently neglected the prescriptions of the Rev. Lot Carey, a very successful physician, and depended on medicines which they had brought with them, and which could not fail to prove injurious.

During the year 1825, Mr. Ashmun purchased of the natives an extensive and fertile tract of country, extending 9 miles on the coast from the Montserado river to the St. Paul's, and indefinitely in the interior. The soil is not only rich, but fertile, half a mile west of its mouth, its waters sweet, and its banks fertile; it is connected to the Montserado by Stockton creek. Soon after this purchase, the Indian chief arrived from Norfolk, Virginia, with 154 emigrants; of which 139 were from North Carolina. Not an individual of the latter number suffered mortality from sickness, while some who left Norfolk in bad health ultimately derived benefit from the change of climate. The territory of the Young Republic of the tract of country 90 miles south of Montserado, in the midst of a country productive in rice, palm oil, camwood, and ivory, was ceded to the society.

For the present state of the colony see the report presented at the annual meeting of the society, January, 1835.

The Methodist missions in Liberia have suffered severely in the death of Rev. Melville B. Cox, Rev. S. O. Wright, and Mrs. Wright. Mr. Spaulding has returned temporarily to the United States. A colored man, Isaac Harris, remains in charge of part of the mission at Grand Bassa. Miss Farrington also stays in Africa.

Notwithstanding the series of unpropitious events which have attended the past efforts of the A. B. in Liberia, the board have not ceased to feel a deep interest in this part of the great field. Their continued inquiries for suitable men, especially for colored men at the south, have been unceasing.

The Western Foreign Missionary, of Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, in 1832, sent out Rev. J. B. Finney. On his return, he passed some time in making known the objects of the society. In October, 1833, he sailed again, in company with Rev. Messrs. Matthew Laird and John Cloud, with Mrs. Laird and James Temple, a colored man. Mr. Finney is temporary governor of the colony. Messrs. Laird and Cloud, with Mrs. Laird, have died. Mr. Temple has returned to this country.

A British African colonization society has been formed, with the design of establishing a colony at cape Mount.

LICHTENAU; a station of the U. B. in Greenland, commenced in 1774. The progress of the mission during the year 1831 was cheering. The number of Greenlanders under the care of the brethren amounted to 671, of whom 390 were communicants; the youth evinced a great desire for instruction, about 60 children, out of a still greater number who regularly attend the school, were able to read. Of the members of the congregation, generally, it may be said, that they walk in the fear of the Lord, and in the comfort of the Holy Ghost.

LICHTENFELS; a station of the U. B. in Greenland, commenced in 1758.

At Lichtenfels, in 1833, Eberle, Melthuse, Kogel, and Lund were missionaries. Congregation, 365.

LIFUKA; the chief of the Hapai islands, where there is a station of the W. M. S., commenced in 1830.

LILY FOUNTAIN; a station of the W. M. S. in Little Namaqualand, near the Khaniesberg. The Rev. B. Shaw, who has long labored at this place, was joined in August, 1825, by Mr. Hadly. Mr. Threlkoff, who came out for the recovery of his health, was retained this object, set forward at the end of June, 1825, with 2 native Christians, on a journey towards the coast, in search of a suitable place for a mission; but they appear to have met a melancholy end by assassination, in the bloom of life,—not one of them being, it is believed, 30 years of age.

Of the influence of the gospel on the people at this station, Mr. Hadly gives the following account:—"The number of persons who attend Lily Fountain as their home is between 7 and 600; and though the Namaquas are naturally addicted to wandering, yet now they seldom leave the institution, unless circumstances compel them; the gospel, the means of grace, their property and friends, all tend to give them an interest in the place, and to unite them together—rare sight this, in this thinly inhabited and barren part of the globe! They have derived an almost insupportable advantage—the absence of those hostilities which none of the tribes of Africa, yet discovered, in a purely heathen state, are free from. Before Christianity was introduced, their neighbors the Boesjians were frequently making attacks on them and stealing their cattle; the consequence of which was, that much blood was shed: but since they have been concentrated into a body, and have had a missionary residing among them, they have had nothing to fear, either from enemies without, or from any who might be disaffected within; for the Boesjians dare not venture to attack the Namaquas now, and the Namaquas will not attack the Boesjians, having been taught by the gospel to regard them as the offspring of the same common parent. Their spiritual and moral improvement is seen in their regard to truth and sincerity in their intercourse with one another, and with all men. While enveloped in darkness, having no fear of God before their eyes, but little, if any, regard was shown to honesty; but, on the contrary, he who most excelled in deception judged himself the most praiseworthy. Their veneration of Jehovah, as the God of providence, and the sovereign Disposer of all things, is the common acceptance of the term, yet many degrading customs and ridiculous ideas prevailed among them; divine light has shone into their hearts, and most, if not all, of these are laid aside. They have been taught to look above the earth for fruits, and higher than the clouds for rain: even to Him 'who gives both: the former and the latter rain,' and commands 'the earth also to yield her increase.' Of many it may be truly said—their conversion is in heaven, from whence also they look for the Savior; their souls breathe after God.' I have been frequently struck with gratitude and admiration, while hearing them, in their rudely constructed huts, offering praise and supplication to the God of Israel; and several times, late at night, after I have gone to rest, I have heard them continuing to sing the songs of Zion. I do not mean to convey the idea that they have all received and obeyed the gospel. No! much remains yet to be done; but surely these fruits of the gospel of the grace of God call loudly for gratitude, and furnish the most encouraging motives to be 'steadfast, immovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord.'"

Inhabitants in Lily Fountain, in 1833, 500. Edward Edwards, missionary. Members, more than 120. Day scholars, more than 100. The state of the mission is most gratifying. General intelligence and Christian principle have succeeded to the darkness of heathenism.

LONSDALE; a new station of the L. M. S. in Berthe, South America. Mr. and Mrs. Mirams, missionaries, who arrived January 22, 1833. Prospects encouraging.

LOVEDALE; a station of the Glasgow Missionary society, among the Caffres of South Africa. Messrs. Ross and Bennie, missionaries. It is 12 miles from Chumie, in a very populous vicinity. The gospel of John has been translated into Caffre. Mr. Bennie has compiled a Caffre vocabulary, and has printed it at Lovedale.

LUCEA; a station of the S. M. S. in Jamaica. James Watson, missionary. So great was the excitement of the public mind consequent on the insurrection in 1832, that Mr. Watson was able to do but little directly in his work for several months. Two schools, 90 or 100 Sabbath children. Lord Milgrave visited the schools, and was much pleased with their appearance. He left a donation of 50 pounds.

LUCKYANTIPORE, 35 miles south of Calcutta, an outstation of the B. M. S., visited by Mr. George Pearce. Five whole families, amounting to 30 individuals, have renounced heathenism.

MACAO; a city in China; lon. 135° 13' E., lat. 22° 13' N. It is built on a peninsula or small island, of 106 miles square, and contains 33,800 inhabitants. It is the only European settlement in China, and was ceded to the Portuguese in 1550. It has a Portuguese governor and a Chinese mandarin; and the English and other nations have factories here. Since the decline of the Portuguese trade, the town has fallen into a state of comparative little importance. Dr. Morrison, of the L. M. S., and Mr. Bridgman, of the A. B. C. F. M., reside occasionally at Macao.

MACKINAC, or MICHELMACKINAC; a post-town and military post in Michigan territory. It is situated upon an island in the strait connecting Lake Huron and Lake Michigan. The town and island is now called Mackinac, and the county and the strait, Mackinac. The county and strait were named in this manner. The island is about 9 miles in circuit. The town is on the south-east side of the island, on a small cove, which is surrounded by a steep cliff, 150 feet high. It consists of two streets parallel with the lake, intersected by others at right angles, and contains a court-house, a jail, and several stores. Population of the county, in 1831, 877. It is much resort to by fur traders, and during the summer is visited by thousands of Indians. Lon. 84° 40' W., lat. 45° 54' N. It is 313 miles north of Detroit. In 1823, the Rev. William M. Ferry commenced a mission on this island for the benefit of the Indians. Mr. Ferry was under the care of the United Foreign Missionary society. In 1827, Mr. Ferry was transferred to the A. B. C. F. M. Through the blessing of God, the mission has been almost uniformly prospered. Some of the fur traders and individuals connected with the United States' army, have been happily converted to God. Many of the Indians have renounced their heathen grace.

At Mackinac there are now, 1834, William M. Ferry, missionary, Lucius Gray, secular superintendent, and their wives. Mason Hearsey, Eunice O. Osnar, Elizabeth M'Farland, Hannah Goodale, Persis Skinner, and Jane Leavitt, teachers. The secular affairs of the mission have been brought within narrow limits, the amount of hired labor diminished, and Mr. Ferry released in a great measure from secular duties, so that information has been received respecting this mission and church recently.

MADAGASCAR; a large island in the Indian ocean, discovered by a Portuguese, in 1492. It lies 4 leagues E. of the continent of Africa, from which it is separated by the strait of Mozambique. It extends 910 miles from N. to S., and is from 200 to 300 broad. The inhabitants, amounting to more than 4,000,000, are divided into a number of tribes. They are commonly tall, well made, and of an olive complexion, and some of them quite black. Their hair is black, but not wavy, and for the most part curls naturally; their noses is small, though not flat; and they have thin lips. They have no towns, but a great number of villages, a small distance from each other. Their houses are pitiful huts, without windows or chimneys, and the roofs covered with reeds or leaves. Those that are dressed in the best manner have a piece of calico cloth or wrapped round their bodies, and some of them still have calico shawls. Both men and women are fond of bracelets, necklaces, and ear-rings. They have little knowledge of commerce, and exchange among themselves goods for goods: gold and silver coins brought by Europeans are immediately melted down for ornaments, and no currency of coin is established. There are a great many petty kings, whose riches consist in cattle and slaves, and they are always at war with each other. There are only some parts of the coast yet known; for both the air and the soil are destructive to strangers.

The Madagassians believe in one only true God, the Creator of all things, and the Preserver and supreme Ruler of the universe; whom they call Zangahara. When they speak of him, they do it with the greatest degree of solemnity and veneration. Though they consider him so infinitely exalted that he does not stoop to intermeddle in the world, yet he still has children, which they call Anzazy. The four great lords are regarded by them as having great influence with Zangahara. Each family has its guardian angel, who conveys their prayers to the four lords, who are the only medium of access to the Deity. Some appearances of Judaism are seen among these islanders. They practise circumcision, and offer the first-fruits of harvest. Of a Savior they have no knowledge. The language of the Madagassians is very melodious, and is said to be copious; though it had never been reduced to a written form till since missionaries resided among them. In the interior are some Arabs, who introduced the use of the Koran, and the arts of civilization. It is probably owing to the influence of these emigrants on the neighboring tribes, that many of them exhibit evident marks of a state of improvement considerably removed from barbarism.

The Rev. Messrs. Jones and Bevan were sent by the L. M. S., in 1818, to this island, and commenced their mission auspiciously. These devoted laborers were soon called, however, to experience heavy afflictions in their persons and families; which were followed by the death of Mr. Jones, from which he was removed from his station to the Mauritius, from a decline in his health.

In the autumn of 1820, his excellency R. T. Farquhar, Esq., governor of the Mauritius, concluded a treaty with Radama, king of Madagascar, having for its object the total extinction of the slave traffic in that island. With the full approbation of the governor, Mr. Jones, being sufficiently recovered, accompanied the agent, Mr. Hastie, to the court of Radama, by whom he was received with much cordiality. The king, being satisfied with the views and objects of the society, which were explained to him by Mr. Jones, wrote to the directors for missionaries to instruct his people in Christian knowledge, and also in the useful arts. It was Mr. Jones' intention to have returned to the Mauritius after the conclusion of the treaty; but in consequence of a formal invitation from the king, he consented to remain at Tananarivo, when the king desired to hire one of the royal houses as his residence, with servants to attend upon him. According to a stipulation of the treaty already alluded to, 20 Madagassian youths were to be instructed in useful arts, with a view to promote civilization in their own country; of whom 10 were sent for this purpose to the Mauritius, and 10 soon after arrived in England, and were placed in the Borough school, to be instructed in the English language on the plan of the B. and F. S. S. In the mean time, the king placed 16 native children, of whom 3 were children of his own sister, and one of the three was heir apparent to the crown; the rest were children of different nobles.

The Rev. Mr. Griffiths arrived in the spring of 1821; and in June, 1822, the missionary brotherhood was increased by the arrival of the Rev. Mr. Jeffreys, accompanied by Mrs. Jeffreys and four missionary artisans. The valuable patronage the king remitted undiminished. At this early stage of missionary effort, good effects appeared; among which may be noticed the suppression of common swearing; though it should be stated, to the reproach of multitudes called Christians, that it was the custom of the inhabitants of the kingdom of Ovah to swear by the name of the king and by the name of the queen, not by the name of the Almighty Creator and Benefactor of mankind. The B. and F. S. S. made a grant to the Madagassian mission of 50 English Bibles and 200 Testaments.

The kingdom of Radama, now called Imerina, is divided into four provinces; in all of which, during 1824, schools were established, with the sanction and under the patronage of the king. At the close of the year they amounted to 22, and the number of children to above 2000. The three schools successively formed at Tananarivo were united into one, which the king denominated the Royal college. From this seminary, containing about 270 boys, 50 of the highest gifted and best behaved were sent to take charge of the schools in the country. Public examinations of the boys' and girls' schools took place in the presence of the king, some of the members of the royal family, the generals of his majesty, and James Hastie, Esq., the British agent, which were highly satisfactory. Messrs. Jones and Griffiths commenced preaching in Malagasse in February of the same year; their congregations consisting usually of about 1000, but occasions of an extraordinary sort have taken above 6000. Several parts of the Scriptures had also been translated, and some books were prepared and preparing for publication. On the 24th of April, Mr. Jeffreys removed to Ambatomananga, a large village situated about 20 miles from Tananarivo, where he commenced a school for boys, and Mrs. Jeffreys another for girls, and conducted stated services in Madagasse. It having been judged expedient that the artisans should superintend the schools, Mr. Canfield has resided in a village about 15 miles from the capital, where he had a school of 110 boys; and Mr. Rowlands in another village about 15 miles distant from the same, where he had a school containing 100 boys. Each of them superintended apprentices, who learned their respective trades; and Mr. Chick was diligently employed on the Sabbath in catechising children, and on the week days in his trade.

In the following year, the labors of the missionaries were continued; the translation of the Madagasse New Testament was completed; a printer, a cotton-spinner, and a carpenter, were sent out; and the mission was deprived of a valuable agent by the death of Mr. Jeffreys. About this time some of the Madagasse youths, one of whom had been at his own earnest request baptized, arrived at the capital.

On the 27th of July, 1823, king Rakama died. By the intrigues of one of his queens, a number of men of the highest rank were put to death, and among the rest the heir presumptive to the throne, the amiable, intelligent, and pious prince Rakatobi, a youth about 15 years of age. Since that period, the island has been in an unsettled state. During the year 1830, Mr. Freeman, one of the missionaries, left the island, and repaired to Cape Town, without the expectation of returning. He was, however, invited in a very friendly manner to return.

There are now at Madagascar, David Griffiths, David Johns, J. J. Freeman, and John Caham, missionaries; G. Chick and James Cameron, assistants. Mr. and Mrs. Atkinson, not being permitted to stay, have proceeded to the Cape. The government have prohibited the natives from receiving baptism and the Lord's supper at the hands of the missionaries; yet the inquiry among the people is on the increase. The attendance on public worship is good, and prayer meetings are kept up. All slaves are forbidden to learn under the heaviest penalties. The scholars were 1214; the queen has ordered them to be replenished with as many as will make a total of 5823. A great demand for books has been created. Messrs. Chick and Cameron are indefatigable in advancing civilization.

MADRAS (Madras prov.) part of the British possessions in Hindostan, comprehending the whole of the country south of the Krishna, excepting a narrow strip on the western coast, and the northern Circars. A considerable portion of it is governed by native princes subordinate to the British, and protected by a subsidiary force; the rest is under the immediate protection of the governor and council of Madras, and in 1822 was subdivided into 24 districts, with an area of 166,000 square miles, and a population of 13,677,000. Madras, the capital, is the largest city on the coast of Coromandel. Lat. 13° 5' N.; lon. 80° 21' E.; 1044 miles from Calcutta; 770 from Bombay. Population in 1823, 415,751. It consists of Fort St. George, Black Town, and the European houses in the environs.

The first mission establishment at Madras was formed in 1727, by the Rev. B. Schultz, under the patronage of the king of Denmark. From that time till 1820, the station of the Baptist Church, the capital, was under the patronage of the C. K. S., now the Gospel Propagation society. Books and tracts to the number of 4336 were circulated in the year ending June, 1832; besides 4270 sold at the Vepery press. The scholars at the various stations amounted to 3220. The society have granted 14,000 rupees for the erection of mission and school houses, &c.

The missions of the L. M. S. were commenced in 1805. At the present time, 1834, W. Taylor, John Smith, John Eiderbeck, and W. H. Draw, are the missionaries. John Regel, assistant. Five native assistants. Native congregation, 100. Communicants, 48. In 19 schools there are 711 children. 3150 Tamil books were printed during the year.

The C. M. S. station, formed in 1815, have as missionaries John Tucker, C. Blackman, J. Pettit, and Alexander Chapman. Several assistants. Average attendance on public worship, 340. Communicants, 176. Attendants on English service, 400. Communicants, 70. Native seminarians, 16. Schools, 27, and 1098 scholars.

MAHMI: a town in the northern part of the island Bombay, about six miles from the town of Bombay, where the missionaries of the A. B. C. F. M. itinerate and distribute tracts.

MALACOTI: a group of 13 small islands in the South sea. Several natives, particularly Anna, connected with the L. M. S., labor there with good success. In 1832, a new chapel was finished. Total baptized since 1823, 253. Schools well attended.

MAHJEDUSK: a station of the American Methodist Missionary society, at Maljeudusk bay, which empties into lake Huron. This is considered of great importance, as being the annual rendezvous of Indians from the north. A native school was established in 1829, under the care of James Currie and David Sawyer. Communicants 32; 33 scholars.

MALACCA, or MALAYA: country of India beyond the Ganges, consisting of a large peninsula, connected with Siam by the isthmus of Kra. It is about 775 miles long, and 120, on an average, broad.

Malacca a sea-port of the above country, on the straits of Malacca; lon. 1° 12' N. It is a fertile and fertile country is fertile and pleasant. Since 1825, it has been permanently occupied by the British authorities. Population, in 1823, 33,506.

In January, 1815, a mission was commenced in this place by the L. M. S. In 1816, Dr. Milne, the associate of Dr. Morrison at Canton, visited Malacca.

While here, Mr. Milne was favored with many excellent opportunities of sending copies of the Chinese New Testament, catechisms, and tracts, to Siam, where, it is said, 20,000 Chinese reside, to Rhio, Cochina China, and various other places, where the Chinese are found in great numbers, as well as of conversing on religious subjects with the sailors belonging to the vessels by which they were conveyed. In Penang only there are said to be 8000 Chinese inhabitants; among whom Mr. Milne went from house to house, distributing the Scriptures and tracts. He calculated that in China and Malacca together, there had been printed and circulated at that period not less than 36,000 Chinese pamphlets and tracts, exclusive of the Holy Scriptures. Towards the great expense of printing Chinese tracts, the Religious Tract society, in London, liberally contributed the sum of 500 pounds.

Mr. Milne's labors were abundant: continuing his translation of the Scriptures into Chinese, studying the Malay, and superintending two Chinese schools. His other works were also proceeding; besides which the settlement had the advantage of two presses, with suitable workmen, and an able superintendent.

Among other important objects which engaged the attention of Dr. Morrison and Mr. Milne, during a visit of the latter to Canton, was the establishment of a seminary, now denominated the Anglo-Chinese College, the principal objects of which are, to impart the knowledge of the English language, and the principles of the Christian religion, to Chinese youth; and the instruction of missionaries and others in the language and literature of China. Dr. Morrison generally proposed, on certain conditions, to contribute towards the object the sum of 4000 dollars, exclusive of a separate donation of 500 pounds to defray the expenses of educating, in the college, one European and one Chinese youth, for five successive years. In the importance of this plan the directors concurred, and the foundation-stone of the institution was laid November 11, 1818, by major William Farquhar, late English resident and commander of Malacca; and several persons of high distinction, as well as the chief Dutch inhabitants, were pleased to attend the ceremony. The college, since erected, stands on the mission premises, in an open and airy situation, close to the western gate of the town, and commands a fine view of the rocks and of the sea. At this time a fund was formed for widows and orphans of the Ultra Ganges mission; in Chinese schools were in a flourishing state; tracts were extensively circulated; the work of translation was making rapid progress; the press was vigorously employed; and much was done in the direct communication of the gospel.

About this period, three Chinese schools were going on prosperously, for five successive years. In the town, in the English and Malay school several hundred boys had learned to read the Holy Scriptures; a Malay school, which was for a time suspended, was re-opened; and a female Malay school, the first establishment of the kind in Malacca, was commenced. On June 1, 1821, Dr. Milne publicly baptized a heathen woman; (her father was a Chinese, and her mother a Siamese); and on the 8th of July following, Mr. Thomsen baptized two Malays, all of whom were European slaves converted to Christianity.

In consequence of the decease of Dr. Milne, which took place January 2, 1822, the Chinese services previously conducted were necessarily suspended. During a visit which Dr. Morrison paid to Malacca, however, they were resumed four times on the Sabbath, and twice on week days: a Chinese youth, formerly a student in the Anglo-Chinese college, occasionally assisted in these services. This individual, who had been long a resident in Canton, was a native of the Christian empire, in connexion with the mission, as a public reader, explaining the Scriptures to his countrymen according to his ability; and occasionally conducting Christian worship in the pagan temple where Dr. Milne formerly preached. The Malayan female servants, and the female Portuguese servants who understand Malay, belonging to the mission, assembled every Sabbath evening, when the Scriptures were read, and a sermon was preached by Dr. Morrison.

On the 20th of May, 1823, the printing of the whole Chinese version of the Scriptures was finished: Afa, a Chinese convert, had the honor both to commence and to complete this work, having arrived from China for that purpose. The number of students on the foundation of the college was then 15; that of candidates for admission, 7. These youths had professedly embraced Christianity, and, generally speaking, entered with zeal and cheerfulness into the religious exercises of the institution.

Josiah Hughes and John Evans are now, in 1833, the missionaries of the L. M. S. in Malacca. At ten o'clock on Sunday morning, a Chinese service is held; at two o'clock, the scholars and teachers from the boys' Chinese schools assemble for public worship. A Portuguese and Malay service follow. Malay and Chinese scholars, 500. The press is actively engaged; 200,000 copies of various tracts have been lately printed, and 32,265 books and tracts in Chinese distributed. 100 copies of the Chinese Scriptures can be printed for 104 Spanish dollars. In 1805, the printing and binding of the New Testament was estimated at two guineas a copy.

MALTA, anciently MELITA; an island in the Mediterranean, lat. 35° 53' N.; lon. 14° 30' E. (of the observatory of the grand master) 60 miles in length; 200,000 inhabitants, the nearest point of Africa. Population, 70,000. Besides the natives, there are English, (about 700 besides the military,) Jews, Greeks, Turks, Egyptians, Italians, French, and Dutch. The Maltese, English, and Italian are the predominant languages. The capital is Valetta, with a population of 40,000, and an excellent harbor, which will contain 500 vessels. The fortifications are the strongest in the world. It was taken from the French by the British in 1800, and confirmed to them by the treaty of Paris in 1814.

The Rev. Mr. Bloomfield, who was sent out by the L. M. S. in 1811, to promote the knowledge of the gospel among the Greeks, was directed to reside for a time at Malta, where he might have an opportunity to learn the Italian language, and to perfect himself in the modern Greek, as well as to obtain the best information concerning the places to which he might afterwards direct his course. While faithfully fulfilling his trust, he preached to a number of Englishmen resident at Valetta, and it is believed, with spiritual advantage to many. He was also active in distributing copies of the Scriptures, of Dr. Doddridge's Rise and Progress in Italian, and of religious tracts, some of which were sent to Sicily, &c. He was informed that a gentleman who visited the Morea left two Greek Testaments at a convent, with the inhabitants were so delighted, that they rang the bells for joy, and performed some extraordinary religious ceremony. In the midst of these cheering circumstances, however, Mr. Bloomfield resigned his work to receive his reward.

In September, 1816, the Rev. Mr. Lowdoses, of the L. M. S., was sent out for the same purposes as those contemplated for his excellent predecessor, and his ministry was not in vain.

The Rev. S. S. Wilson, of the same society, arrived at Malta at the commencement of 1819; in consequence of which Mr. Lowdoses left that place, to carry into effect the various objects of his mission: he afterwards settled at Zante, and ultimately at Corfu. Mr. Wilson, in addition to various engagements, prepared several books for publication in modern Greek. In 1823, his congregation had increased to about 250 hearers, of whom a considerable number gave satisfactory evidence of genuine piety, and many others of most eminent moral qualities. The number of communicants was increased to 50. In the Sabbath school there were about 30 English children; 20 Greek boys and girls also attended, who learned Mr. Wilson's Greek catechism, and passages of Scripture both in Greek and Italian. Mr. Wilson resumed his Greek services; the attendance, including children, was about 50. During his absence in England, the American brethren commenced a small school for Greeks; an English young lady, whom Mr. Wilson formerly instructed in modern Greek, had the charge of the female department of it. The boys were taught by Mr. Temple, assisted by Mr. Wilson. The latter devoted a portion of every day to the instruction of a few Greek boys, from Scio, in ancient Greek, English, and Italian. One of these boys translated a considerable part of Turner's "Arts and Sciences," and proceeded with the work under Mr. Wilson's direction.

No recent report of the L. M. S.'s operations in Malta have been received.

The attention of the C. M. S. having been drawn to the Mediterranean as an important sphere of labor, it was determined to send thither a representative. The Rev. William Jewett offered himself for this service; and after due preparation, proceeded, in the year 1815, to Malta, as the most suitable place of residence. The society had adopted, on the suggestion of the late Rev. Dr. Buchanan, the plan of sending a literary representative to a sphere of this nature, where direct missionary labors were not practicable; and Mr. Jewett had the benefit of much friendly conference with that distinguished man, who had himself led the way, and given an admirable model, in the conducting of Christian researches. The objects of the society, in establishing representatives in the Mediterranean, were, the acquisition of information relative to the state of religion and of society, with the best means of its melioration, and the propagation of Christian knowledge, by the press, by journeys, and by education. Mr. Jewett returned with his family, to this country, for the restoration of his health, in the year 1820. During the five years of his absence, he had been resident chiefly in Malta; but he had spent a considerable time in Corfu, and had twice visited Egypt and some parts of Greece.

The results of this visit to the Mediterranean have been in many respects highly important; these he has since given to the public, in a very interesting and valuable volume, which has awakened a lively interest in behalf of the sphere in which his energies have been engaged. Mr. Jewett subsequently returned to Malta.

A second volume of very valuable Researches has proceeded from his pen, and been republished in the United States. He is now in England, having been disabled by the effect of his residence in the Mediterranean upon his health from resuming his labors there. He has since become one of the secretaries of the M. S., and is engaged in the editorial missionary work, in translation and printing of books, chiefly Arabic. Tracts issued in 1832, Italian, 62; Greek, 23,393; Arabic, 12,368.

The A. B. C. F. M. commenced a mission here in 1820, with the design of benefiting the mingled inhabitants of Palestine. The first missionaries sent by the board to the Holy Land were the Rev. Messrs. L. Parsons and P. E. Fisk, who arrived at Smyrna, January 13, 1820, and were cordially welcomed by the chaplain and other gentlemen.

After obtaining the requisite information for the government of their future measures, they embarked for the island of Scio, where they spent some time in the study of the modern Greek, and soon after visited the seven churches of Asia. Mr. Parsons then went to Jerusalem, where he spent some months in distributing the word of life, and religious tracts in nine different languages. In January, 1822, in consequence of his declining health, he sailed with Mr. Fisk for Alexandria, where, on the 10th of February, he yielded up his spirit to him who gave it. The Rev. D. and Mrs. Temple arrived at Malta, February 22, 1822. A printing establishment was also sent; which has been, and will probably continue to be, a powerful and useful engine in promoting the designs of the mission; this press was procured, and kept in operation for the term of five years, by benevolent individuals in Boston. It was calculated that in about two years there were printed by it more than two million and a half of pages of religious tracts.

Messrs. Temple and Hallock left Malta, with their families and printing establishment, and arrived at Smyrna on the 23d of December, 1833. The Arabic part of the printing establishment was sent to Beirut. The printing at Malta was commenced in July, 1822. Since that time, 350,000 copies of books and tracts and 21,000,000 of pages have been printed, mostly in modern Greek. 6975 Bibles were issued in the year by the B. F. B. S., and 9500 publications by the L. M. S.

MANALA. Davida and Tiera, two native teachers, were left at this, which is one of the Hervey islands, by the deputation from the L. M. S. During the first two months of their residence on the island a few embraced the gospel; that number has since increased to 120.

MANDUCHIO; a suburb of Corfu, the chief town of Corfu, one of the Ionian islands, where a school has been established.

MANEPEY; a station of the A. B. C. F. M. on the island Ceylon, 4 1/2 miles N. W. of Jaffnapatam. It was established in 1821. Henry R. Foulerton, missionary, and H. Minor, printer, and their wives are now at Manepey. (See Ceylon.)

MANGUNGA; a station of the W. M. S. on E' O' Keanga, in New Zealand, founded in 1827. W. White and John Whiteley, missionaries. Mr. Hobbs has removed to the Friendly Islands. In connexion with this station, 43 villages are visited four times in the week by 100 scholars of good promise. A thirst for knowledge is rapidly increasing.

MARQUESSAS; five islands in the Pacific ocean, named Christina, Magdalena, Dominica, St. Pedro, and Hood. The first four were discovered by Quiros, in 1595; the last by Cook, in 1774. Dominica is much the largest, being about 48 miles in circuit. The products of these islands are bread-fruit, bananas, plantains, coconuts, scarlet beans, paper mulberries, (of the bark of which their cloth is made,) casnarinas, with other tropical plants and trees. The Marquesans are of large stature, well made, strong, and active, of a tawny complexion, but look almost black by being tattooed over the whole body. Some of the women are nearly as fair as Europeans, and among these tattooing is not common, and then only on the heads and arms. Their language much resembles that of the Society islands. Two Tahitian teachers were stationed by the Rev. Mr. Crook, of the L. M. S., on Tahutu, (or Santa Christina,) in 1823; but after continuing there about 10 months, and seeing no prospect of success, they returned home. It has since determined to attempt a missionary settlement on Nughiva, another island of the same group, considered for that purpose as superior to Tahutu. Maracore, one of the teachers who was stationed at the latter island by Mr. Crook, proposes, with that view, to return to the Marquesas, accompanied by three or four families from Tahiti. Mr. Crook has prepared a Marquesan spelling-book, an edition of which has been printed for their use.

Maracore and his companions expected to proceed to the Marquesas in the Minerva, captain Ehiril, who is son-in-law to Mr. Henry, missionary in Eimeo, and well disposed to promote their views. Mr. Crook has supplied them with stationery, and the members of his church and congregation have furnished them abundantly with articles of apparel and food, useful implements, &c. Each of them presented some gift on the occasion; they have also, jointly, presented to captain Ehiril a small box half a ton of cocoa-nut oil, as a compensation for the passage, &c. of the teachers.

Two stations have been formed by the L. M. S. on Marquesas, supplied by native teachers. The king has learned to read, as well as a number of others. The missionaries of the A. B. C. F. M. at the Sandwich Islands commenced a mission here in 1833, but soon relinquished it. The Rev. G. Scallworthy and Rev. John Rodgers sailed from Portsmouth, England, October, 1833, to join the Marquesas mission of the L. M. S.

MARY, Sr.; a small island at the mouth of the Gambia, N. Africa, separated from the main land by a creek, between 13° and 14° N. lat. The inhabitants are from different parts of the continent, and many from the heart of Africa. The island is well situated for commerce, and the soil is said to be flourishing. Bathurst is the principal town. Here the W. M. S. has a society and a school, both of which are attended by pleasing circumstances. (See BATHURST.)

MATURA; a small town and fortress on the southern extremity of Ceylon. E. lon. 80° 37', N. lat. 5° 55'. It is 100 miles S. E. of Colombo. Mr. Lalman, of the W. M. S., commenced a mission here in 1814. 120 members at Matura. 12 schools; 553 scholars. Elijah Toyne, missionary.

MAULMEIN; a station of the A. B. B. in Birmah. It is a new town, on the Martaban river, 25 miles from its mouth, commenced in 1827. For further particulars, see BIEMAH, RANGKON, TAYO, &c.

MAUNEE; a station of the A. C. F. M. among a small number of Indians in the N. part of Ohio. Isaac Van Tassel, missionary; William Colver, pastor, and their wives. The mission will soon be abandoned.

MAUPITI; one of the Society islands, in the S. Pacific ocean; 40 miles W. Borabora.

About 1822, two native teachers were sent here from the L. M. S.'s station at Borabora.

In 1823, the deputation visited Maupiti, in compliance with the earnest request of the king. They witnessed the rapid progress which the cause had made in the knowledge of the gospel, and were present at the baptism of 74 persons, 291 having been baptized; in all, 365. They assisted also in the formation of an A. M. S., the subscription to which amounted to nearly 1000 bambos of cocoa-nut oil.

The teachers, beside attending to their appropriate missionary duties, have not been inattentive to civilization; they have displayed their industry and skill in the erection of dwelling houses, boat building, and in making, with dried goat-skins, a pair of bellows for a smith's forge.

No recent report has been received from this island.

MAURITIUS, or ISLE OF FRANCE; an island in the Indian ocean, 400 miles E. of Madagascar. It was discovered by the Portuguese, but the first settlers were the Dutch, in 1598. They called it Mauritius in honor of prince Maurice, their stadtholder, but on their acquisition of the cape of Good Hope they deserted it, and it continued unsettled till the French landed in 1730, and gave it the name of the Isle of France. In 1810 it was taken from them by the British, to whom it was ceded in 1814. The island is 150 miles in circuit, and the climate healthy, but the soil not very fertile; there are many mountains, some of which have their tops covered with snow; but they produce the best ebony in the world. The valleys are watered by rivers, and made productive and fertile, and the soil, which is desert, and the principal objects; and there are a great number of rattle, deer, goats, and sheep. The town and spacious harbor, called Port Louis, are strongly fortified; but in the hurricane months the harbor cannot afford shelter for more than eight vessels. In 1816, a fire consumed 1547 houses, the most opulent part of the town; and in 1818, the island suffered great devastation by a tremendous hurricane. Port Louis is situated on the east coast. E. lon. 57° 22', S. lat. 20° 17'. The Rev. Mr. Le Brun, an agent of the L. M. S., arrived here in June, 1814, and immediately commenced his important work.

In 1817, governor Farquhar, in addition to placing at the disposal of Mr. Le Brun a spacious building, well adapted to the purpose of education, wrote to the directors in terms of "an approbation of his labors."

Twenty-five persons were about this time, and in 1818, a mission society. In 1821 the had increased to 43; the congregation was considerable; 112 boys and 83 girls were under instruction, governor Farquhar ordering an allowance of 30 dollars per month towards the support of the former; and a school at Belombere continued in a prosperous state.

Mauritius has now, in 1834, 91,000 inhabitants, chiefly blacks. Mr. Le Brun, on account of ill health, has been obliged to relinquish his station. Communicants, 53; baptisms during the year, 99.

MAUTI, or PARRY'S ISLAND: one of the Hervey islands, where two of the L. M. S.'s native teachers are engaged.

MAYAVERAM; a large town of about 10,000 inhabitants, 21 miles N. E. of Comboocoom, and 10 W. Tranquebar. The C. M. S. has had a school at this place since 1819, which was visited by many others from Tranquebar. The head-quarters of its school establishment had been at Tranquebar from the year 1816, but they are now removed to Mayaveram. The mission premises lie between this town and the village of Coimado; the foundation-stone of the buildings was laid June 10th, 1825. The Rev. Mr. Barenbrack had spent the greater part of 1824 at Comboocoom, not without a blessing on his labors; in April and June, 1825, he sailed to baptism, before he left Tranquebar, nine adults, most of whom were the fruits of his labors when at Comboocoom, and had come to him at Tranquebar for baptism. On one of these occasions, some children also were baptized, in reference to whom he feelingly says:—"I was very much affected, during the act of baptism, on seeing two of these dear little ones, four and six years of age, kneel down before the font; and though some of the by-standers wished them to stand up, they were not to be moved, but held their folded hands upwards, apparently with much devotion, which affected me to tears.

There are now employed at Mayaveram J. C. T. Winckler, a native catechist, and a native assistant. Congregation, 137; communicants, 32; native teachers, 47; seminarists, 33; schools, 31; scholars, 1750. Rev. G. T. Barenbeck, who labored long and faithfully at this station, has died. The mission appears to be in a very prosperous state.

MEERUT: a town in the province of Delhi, Hindostan, 32 miles N. E. of Delhi, having one of the most important military establishments in the presidency of Bengal. E. lon. 77° 52', N. lat. 29° 10'.

The corresponding committee of the C. M. S. at Calcutta first employed two native Christians at Meerut, to read the Scriptures and superintend schools; but in 1815, the Rev. H. Fisher arrived as chaplain of the military department.

Alluding to a conversation which Mr. Fisher had with the natives Christians, according to his usual practice on the Sabbath, he says:—"Last Sunday we were conversing on the universality of the feeling that prevails in all nations, that some atonement for sin is necessary. I related to them what my three sons had seen as they returned with me from Hurdwar. A fakcer was observed by the road-side, preparing something extraordinary; which, having never observed before, he excited a curiosity to draw near and examine his employment. He had several Hindoo pilgrims seated round him, and was passing the Holy Ganges; who assisted in preparing the wretched device for some horrible penance, to which he had voluntarily bound himself, in order to expiate the guilt of some crime which he had committed long ago. His attendants literally worshipped him; kissing his feet, calling him God, and invoking his blessing. A large fire was kindled under the extended branch of an old tree; to this branch the fakcer fastened two strong ropes, having at the lower end of each a stuffed noose, into which he introduced his feet; and thus being suspended with his head downward over the fire, a third rope (at a distance toward the end of the branch) was fixed, by which he succeeded with one hand to set himself in a swinging motion backward and forward through the smoke and flaming fire, which was kept blazing by a constant supply of fuel, ministered by many of his followers; with the other hand he counted a strict and a fixed number of times, so as to ascertain the termination of the four hours, for which he had doomed himself daily to endure this exercise for twelve years, nine of which are nearly expired. A narrow bandage is over his eyes, and another over his mouth, to guard against the suffocating effects of the smoke. By this means, he says, he shall atone for the guilt of his sins, and be made holy forever. The last half hour of the four hours, the people say, he sits upright with his arms in a circular motion, round the fire. On coming down, he rolls himself in the hot ashes of the fire. The boys went to see him again in the evening, when he was engaged in his prayers, but to what or whom they could not tell.

"I asked my little congregation what they thought of all this. They sat silent, with their eyes cast down, and sighed heavily. At length, Anand turned to Matthew Phirodeen, and, passing his arms round his neck, exclaimed, with the most touching expression of affection as well as of gratitude to God, 'Ah, my brother! my brother! such devils once were we! but now (and he lifted up his eyes to heaven, and elevated his whole person) Jesus! Jesus! my God! my Savior!' It was very affecting."

No reports have of late been received from Meerut.

MERIGUI: a station of the A. B. C. in Birmah. Ko Ing, native pastor; one assistant. Prospects encouraging.

MESOPOTAMIA: a mission of the U. B. in Jamaica.

MILLSBURG: a town on the St. Paul's river, in the colony of Liberia, Western Africa. It has a school, with about 30 scholars.

MIRZAPORE: a town on the south bank of the Ganges. E. lon. 82° 37', N. lat. 25° 10'. At the annual Hindoo fair about 40,000 people assemble. Three services are held weekly by the missionaries at Calcutta.

MITIARO: one of the Hervey islands. This island is barren; the inhabitants, although they do not exceed 100, find it difficult to subsist. They are attentive to instruction, diligent in their reading, and kind to their teachers, sent them by the L. M. S. They have erected a neat plastered chapel, and several have offered themselves as candidates for baptism. Mr. Bourne baptized, during a visit, 22 adults and 24 children.

MONGHYR: a station of the B. M. S., 250 miles N. W. of Calcutta, commenced in 1810; Andrew Leslie and W. Moore, missionaries. The chapel has been enlarged to double its former size. Matthew and John have been translated into the Hill language, which had not before been reduced to writing. Schools on the plan of teaching English, and excluding heathen teachers, promise well.

MONROVIA: the principal town of the American colony at Liberia, on the coast of Africa, named in honor of James Monroe, the president of the United States at the time the colony was established. Monrovia stands on cape Montserrat, in about the sixth degree of N. lat. The houses are substantially built, many of them of stone. The schools contain about 70 children. Baptist, Methodist, and Presbyterian churches are erected.

MONTEGO BAY: a station of the Baptist M. S. on the island Jamaica. A church was formed in 1827, and in three years it numbered about 400 communicants. The number of members now amounts to 1,227; of inquirers, 3,343. W. lon. 76° 50', N. lat. 18° 29'. MONTSEBAST: one of the Caribbee islands, under British authority. It is about 25 miles in circuit, and contains a population of about 11,000, of whom 10,000 are colored. W. lon. 62° 15', N. lat. 16° 47'. There are more than 40 estates on this island.

The Rev. J. Maddock, from the W. M. S., visited it, and opened a school with 103 scholars, May 28, 1820. In 1822, 221 pupils belonged to the schools, who, generally, made pleasing improvement. The owners of the estates encourage missionary efforts, and contribute liberally to the mission. One or two chapels have been erected, which are crowded with persons furnishing for the bread of life. The labors and instructions of the missionaries have produced a visible moral change among the inhabitants, some of whom have become, it is hoped, subjects of divine grace. Where habits of dissipation and rioting formerly prevailed, decorum and good order now predominate. In 1824, August 5, 1823, under the patronage of the most influential characters on the island. At its formation about 130 souls were contributed.

"Throughout the year 1826," the missionaries remark, "the good hand of our God has been upon us. Thirty-six have been admitted into the society, 2 have been added to our number from Antigua, and 3 remain on trial. Two new estates have been opened, and a small school has been formed at the north part of the island. The increase to the society is not so rapid here as in some places. The people ponder well the matter, and are slow to take a step of so much importance. This was formerly a Roman Catholic country; and, no doubt, one great cause of their deliberation is the fear of what is called by Roman Catholics changing their religion! From this fear, however, about 60 souls have been happily delivered, who are now members of our society. Much good is doing in the island by the mission, and the prospect is very cheering.

MORLEY: a station of the W. M. S. on the Urutata river, in Dapa's tribe, among the Caffres, South Africa.

Congregation at Morley, 200 to 300. Members, 24; adults baptized, 14; candidates, 9; scholars, 250. Samuel Palmer, missionary. The station is extending a moral influence over a large population. It was commenced in 1823.

MOUNT COKE: a station of the W. M. S., among the Caffres, near the Buffalo river, in South Africa, commenced in 1825.

W. B. Boyce is now the missionary at Mount Coke. Congregation, 70 to 80; members, 18; scholars, 31. The gospel has been preached in various journeys.

MUNCEY TOWN: a station of the American Methodist Missionary society, on the river Thames, Upper Canada, where a remnant of the Delaware and Ojibwa tribes are settled. It was commenced in 1825.

N.

NAGERCOIL: head-quarters of the mission in the eastern division of South Travancore, of the L. M. S., commenced in 1806, 14 miles from cape Comorin. Tamil, prevalent language. C. Maut, W. Miller, missionaries. Roberts, assistant; 17 native readers and 4 assistants. The prosperity of the mission becomes every year more conspicuous and encouraging. Fifty-one outstations, at 35 of which there are native congregations amounting to 1600. Last year 113 families abandoned heathenism. There are 48 scholars, and in 4 female schools there are 38 scholars. The seminary has 26 youths; 30,000 tracts printed for this station and for Palanacottah.

NASSUCK: a place of pilgrimage, in the Deccan, in Western India, where in 1832 the C. M. S. established a mission. Inhabitants, 30,000. W. Mitchell, C. P. Farrar, and John Dixon, missionaries. Vigorously entered on, though many discouragements.

NAMAQUALAND: a country of South Africa, situated on both sides of the great Orange river. (See KHAMESBERG, LILY FOUNTAIN, &c.)

NEGAPATAM, or NEGAPATANAM: a sea-port town on the Coromandel coast, in the Carnatic, Hindostan, 48 miles E. Tanjore, having a population of from 15,000 to 20,000 inhabitants, who are notorious for immorality and idolatrous ceremonies.

The Rev. J. Mowat, and Mr. J. Kats, assistant, from the W. M. S., arrived in 1821. In the early part of that year the Rev. Mr. Squance visited this place, and preached in Tamil to considerable assemblies. Other missionaries have since occupied the station. A native school has been established, with encouraging prospects.

The inhabitants of Negapatam are now, 1834, from 15 to 20,000. The Tamil part of the society has given rise to satisfaction. Alfred Bourne missionary. A remarkable work of God has occurred at Melanattam a large village of Romanists, 40 miles south.

NEGOMBO: a populous town on the west coast of Ceylon, 20 miles north of Colombo. Population estimated at 15,000. Missionary operations were commenced here by the W. M. S. about 1815.

In 1825, the missionaries remark:—"Upon a general view of the work of God on this station, there appears to be cause for gratitude mingled with regret. The interests of the light are very low in the town of Negombo and its immediate vicinity. The congregations are exceedingly small, and the numbers of those who from the commencement of the mission were regular in their attendance upon the means of grace have been gradually reduced by death; yet we rejoice in knowing that they have been removed to the church triumphant. But although there is not much prospect of immediate usefulness in that part of the circuit, an indirect benefit has been conferred; a higher tone of morals has been induced, and the rays of divine light spread over the Catholic population through the medium of our flourishing schools, cannot fail, by the gracious influences of the Holy Spirit, of producing some good. The general state of the classes is encouraging; no exercise of discipline having been necessary in the course of the preceding year, although we have 7 classes and 72 members; and we have every reason to believe that the work of grace is deepening in the hearts of the members of society; and we trust that, by the power of the Holy Spirit, there will be an extension of the work in this ensuing year."

Mr. Hardy, at Negombo, the head-quarters of the Catholics, has had the happiness to receive under his care a whole village. They gave him his church, and from the steps of the altar he preached to 500 souls.

NELLORE: a parish near Affanpatan, in the district of Jaffna, Ceylon. Population, 5 or 6000. The Rev. J. Knight, from the C. M. S., and a native pastor of 9 schools, removed from Jaffnapatam to Nellore, November, 1818.

"This," says Mr. Knight, "is one of the strong-holds of idolatry, as one of the largest temples in the whole district (in which there are said to be not less than a thousand) is at Nallore. There are annual exhibitions, as are described by Dr. Buchanan in his Researches; and I have myself witnessed the procession of a car, where thousands of deluded worshippers were collected together, to prostrate themselves, and pay their homage to a god which could not save. Their prejudices are, at present, deeply rooted in favor of their ancient customs and superstitions; and, unfortunately, in addition to their prejudices of caste and regard for reputation, have all their temporal interests at stake; for if once they renounced idolatry, they would have no means of support."

"With respect to the Roman Catholics, the show and parade of their worship and processions greatly attract the attention of this people, and their pretended power of working miracles is admirably calculated to excite in their weakness and credulity. At their festivals, they are operated on by the ashes of a deceased saint, and numbers flock to them with their maladies and their offerings; by which their funds and their influence are rapidly increased: indeed, the Catholics and Gentoos seem to vie with each other, who shall make the most splendid show; while many look on with careless indifference, or are even amused with what they witness."

Among the proof afforded of the influence of superstition, it is stated by a person who had done some work for Mr. Knight came to ask for his money, saying that he wanted it to buy rice for the devil. This, it seems, was in consequence of the approach of an annual ceremony, when the deluded heathens endeavor to ascertain their fate for the ensuing year. On this occasion, each person, however poor, contrives to purchase a little rice, which is boiled with much superstitions and incantations in an earthen dish, used only for this purpose, and then broken, and the rice is said to fall twelve months. They profess to discover their destiny by the manner in which the rice first begins to boil. If it boil up freely, they suppose the devil is pleased, and they expect prosperity; but if otherwise, the most disastrous consequences are anticipated.

Soon after his removal to this station, Mr. Knight opened his house for preaching, and was occasionally assisted by the Rev. Christian David, of whom Dr. Buchanan makes honorable mention. He also went out into the adjacent villages, and conversed with the people wherever he could find them—in their temples, at their houses, or by the way-side. And, in addition to these exertions, he opened a school for the purpose of instructing boys in reading the Holy Scriptures; and had, in a short time, the pleasure of collecting twenty-four pupils, who had an excellent capacity, and made a pleasing progress in their studies. In the midst of all these exertions, however, the cholera morbus appeared in the district; in consequence of which his labors were necessarily suspended, the school was broken up, and the state of the natives, under this afflictive visitation, became truly distressing. His labors were, however, subsequently resumed.

At Nallore, 13,336 tracts and books have been lately printed. Joseph Knight and W. Adley, missionaries.

NEYOOR; head-quarters of the western division of the mission in South Travancore, commenced in 1823, by L. M. S. C. Mead and C. Miller, missionaries. Fifteen native readers, with 26 assistants. Out-stations, 64; 700 families and 2500 persons under means of grace; 51 schools, 1162 scholars.

NEVIS; an island of the West Indies. It is a beautiful spot, and little more than a single mountain, whose base is about 23 miles in circumference. The island was evidently the production of a volcano. It is well watered, and produces much sugar. The exports are estimated at $77,400 dollars. It belongs to the English, and is divided into 5 parishes, containing 15,750 inhabitants, of whom 15,000 are slaves.

The W. M. S. commenced a mission here in 1783 by Rev. Dr. Coke. The Wesleyans followed the labors of the missionaries. Messrs. Whitehouse and Button are now the missionaries. At Charleston, the number in society is 771. A number have died in joyful expectation of eternal life.

NEW BRUNSWICK; a British province of North America, bounded north by Lower Canada and west by Maine. Population, 73,626. The capital is Fredericton, with 1849 inhabitants. The Gospel Propagation society employs about 20 missionaries, at 30 stations. The W. M. S. occupy 11 stations, and employ 16 missionaries. Members, 1351. Scholars, 778.

NEWFIELD; a station of the U. B. in the eastern part of the island of Antigua. It was established in 1817. In one year, 115 were added to communion. They have a stone church 64 feet by 37.

NEW SOUTH WALES. The following facts respecting the geography, &c. of this country we copy from the American Encyclopedia.

New South Wales, an English colony, on the eastern coast of New Holland. Cook landed here (1770) on his first voyage, took possession of the country in the name of his sovereign, and called it New South Wales. He also gave its name to Botany bay, which he entered at the same time. The favorable report which he made of the harbor and neighboring country determined the British government to found a colony there, (1778) which was soon after removed to Sydney, in Port Jackson, and which, although composed in a great measure of convicts, soon became very prosperous. In 1803, a settlement was established on Van Dieman's Land. (See Van Dieman's Land.)

The Blue mountains were passed, and in 1815 the site of the town of Bathurst (140 miles west of Sydney) was selected. In 1829, exploring parties had penetrated to a distance of 600 miles into the interior. On the eastern coast, colonization has extended to Moreton bay, 450 miles north of Sydney, and to Port Western, at an equal distance south. Swan River settlement was established on the western coast of New Holland in 1829. By a proclamation of the governor, in 1829, the limits within which it was permitted to settle comprised 31,000 square miles, and included 19 counties. The census of that year gave a population of 36,513 souls. The number of acres located was 2,906,000; cleared, 231,573; cultivated, 71,623; horses, 12,479; horned cattle, 262,983; sheep, 536,391. The staple of the colony is wool, of which, in 1822, 172,880 pounds were exported; in 1829, the export had increased to 1,096,000 pounds. The total value of exports in 1829 was 151,720 pounds; of imports, 678,663 pounds. The inhabiitants consist of the officers of the colony, who are landed proprietors, and have some of the convicts as servants; of voluntary emigrants, generally poor persons, transported free of expense, to whom land, &c. is given; of convicts who have become free; and of convicts still under the operation of their sentence. Bushrangers are convicts who escape to the woods, and live by depredations on the colonists. The colonists have lately turned their attention less exclusively to pasturage, and more to agriculture; corn, potatoes, tobacco, hemp, fax, and all kinds of tropical fruits, are cultivated. The climate is mild and healthy; the winter is rainy; it begins in March, and continues till August; there is no snow except on the highest mountains. The colony, although it promises to be of great importance to the mother country, has thus far been a burden. The revenue, in 1826, was 102,577 pounds; the expenditure, 227,951. The commercial connections are principally with England, cape of Good Hope, China, Mauritius, Van Dieman's Land, and New Zealand. The moral condition of the colonists is low; schools, however, have been instituted, and are producing good effects; and in 1829 a college was founded at Sydney. Several newspapers, and three or four quarterly periodicals, are published. The government is under a governor-general and a legislative council (created in 1829); justice is administered by civil, criminal, and admiralty courts.

The issues of the Bible auxiliary in New South Wales, in its last year, were 256 Bibles and 131 Testaments; making a total, from the beginning, of 7415 copies. Fifty reams of paper have been sent. A grammar and vocabulary of the aboriginal language, with a translation of Luke's gospel, have been made. The Wesleyan society have sent 24,051 publications. C. M. S. established a mission here in 1822. John C. S. Handt and W. Watson, missionaries.

NESTORIANS. Rev. Justin Perkius, of the A. B. C. F. M., and his wife, proceeded on the 17th of May, 1834, from Constantinople to establish a mission among the Nestorians, on lake Oormiah, in Persia.

NEW AMSTERDAM; a station of the L. M. S. at Berbice, South America. John Coray, missionary, 1825; 60 native converts; 42 adult married church; 137 Sunday scholars; communicants, 155; 60 couples married.

NEW ZEALAND; 2 large islands in the South Pacific ocean, east of New South Wales. The northern island is about 600 miles in length; its average breadth is 150; and the southern is nearly as large; it is separated from the other by a strait 12 or 15 miles broad. These islands were discovered by James Cook, in 1770, and 48° E. long. and 39° S. They appear to have been first visited, in 1642, by Abel Jansen Tasman, a Dutch navigator, who sailed from Batavia for the purpose of making discoveries in the Pacific ocean. The land in the northern island is, generally, good, and in many parts very fertile. The New Zealanders are supposed to have originated from Assyria, or Egypt; the overflows of the Nile and the Argonautic expedition are evidently alluded to in their traditions. In their persons, they are above the common stature, and are remarkable for perfect symmetry of shape and great muscular strength. They possess strong natural affections, and, like other savage nations, are grateful for favors; but they never rest satisfied till they have revenged an injury. War is their glory, and fighting the principal topic of their conversation. They are cannibals, and devour their enemies when slain in battle, and not infrequently make a reputation upon their slaves. They are exceedingly superstitious, and their religion is constituted of rites the most offensive and disgusting. Pride, ignorance, cruelty, and licentiousness, are some of its principal characteristics. They believe in the existence of a Supreme Being, or the "Immortal Shadow," whom they call Atua. Their language is radically the same as the Tahitian. The population of the two islands has been variously estimated, and is supposed by some to exceed 500,000.

The Rev. Samuel Marsden, principal chaplain of New South Wales, who had become acquainted with the character and disposition of the people, and considered them the noblest race of heathens known to the civilized world, proposed to the C. M. S. the formation of a settlement for their civil and religious improvement. The proposal having been adopted, a mission of 25 persons was fitted out, which arrived at Port Jackson in 1810, on their way to New Zealand; but their object was defeated. Having gained the confidence and affection of several of the chiefs, Mr. Marsden purchased a ship called the Active, for the benefit of the mission; and, in 1815, Messrs. Keudall, Hall, and King, with their wives and some mechanics, arrived, accompanied by two New Zealand chiefs, who had visited England, and were fixed at the northern island of New Zealand, where a transfer of land had been made to the C. M. S. of about 200 acres in extent, for the consideration of 12 axes. The grant was signed in a manner quite original; the chief, named Ahooee O Gunna, having copied, as his sign manual, the marks tattooed upon his own face.

In January, 1819, the Rev. J. Butler, with Mrs. Butler and their two children, Mr. Hall, and Mr. and Mrs. Kemp, sailed from England; and, accompanied by Mr. Marsden, they arrived at Port Jackson, where they were accompanied by New Zealand by Mr. Marsden; who, during his second visit to the island, purchased from Slingheea a tract of land consisting of 13,000 acres, about 12 miles distant from Ranghee Hoo, for the purpose of a new settlement. The selection of this spot, called Kaitere Kaitere, was attended with considerable umbrage to Korokorro, the chief, commanding a large extent of the coast on the north side of the bay of Islands; and some of the chiefs evinced much disappointment that none of the settlers were inclined to take up their residence with them. "One of them, named Pomarre," says Mr. Marsden, "told me he was very angry because I had not brought a blacksmith for him; and that when he had done so, he would have been glad to have had one as soon as possible; but he replied it could be of no use to him to send a blacksmith when he was dead, and that he was at present in the greatest distress. His wooden spades, he stated, were all broken, and he had not an axe to make any more; his canoes were going to pieces, and he had not a nail to mend them with; his potato grounds were lying waste, as he had not a hoe to break them up; and for want of cultivation, he and his people would have no means of subsistence. He endeavored to pacify him with promises; but he paid little attention to what I said, in respect to sending him a smith at a future period. I then promised him a few hoes, &c. which operated like a cordial on his wounded mind."

On the 2d of March, 1820, Mr. Keendall sailed from the bay of Islands, in company with two native chiefs, Shunghee and Whykato, and arrived in the Thames on the 8th of August. After their return from this country, the missionaries at Kiddee Kiddee were exposed to various insults and injuries, in consequence of the altered temper of Shunghee, who had recently committed acts of appalling atrocity. Early in 1822, Shunghee and his adherents recommenced the work of destruction, and the missionaries were frequently compelled to witness scenes of dreadful cruelty.

Of the second missionary station in New Zealand, the same writer observes:—"Kiddee Kiddee resembles a neat little country village, with a good school-house erected in the centre. When standing on a conspicuous eminence, we may see cattle, sheep, goats, pigs, horses, houses, fields covered with wheat, oats, and barley, and gardens richly filled with all kinds of vegetables, fruit-trees, and a variety of useful productions. In the yards may be seen geese, ducks, and turkeys; and, in the evening, cows returning to the mission families, to supply them with good milk and butter. Indeed, the settlement altogether forms a most pleasing object, especially as being in a heathen land."

Intelligence of a distressing nature was more recently received. Disturbances having been renewed among the natives in the vicinity of the Wesleyan settlement at Whangaroa, several of the church missionaries, with a party of natives from Kiddee Kiddee, went thither to the assistance of their friends. They soon returned, accompanied by the Wesleyan missionaries, in the cutter. When standing on the point of Port Jackson, Mr. W. Williams gives the following particulars, under date of the 18th of January, from Pyhea:—"The whole of the premises at Whangaroa, which have been put up at a great expense, are now destroyed, either by fire or in some other way, and the property has been carried abroad, to any place within distance. Intelligence was then received that Shunghee was killed; and the natives belonging to Kiddee Kiddee said that the missionaries would certainly be stripped of every thing that they possessed, according to the New Zealand custom; and recommended them to do the best for themselves. In addition to these things, we have every reason to be apprehensive for the safety of this settlement; it being probable, that if one part of the mission is broken up, the natural disposition of the natives would lead them to complete their work in the destruction of the other." Mr. Williams adds, on the 22d:—"Since I finished my letter on the 18th, we have received news which leads us to suppose that Shunghee is either dead, or very near his death, from the wounds which he received at Whangaroa. If this be true, all that we have anticipated respecting our settlements is likely to come to pass."

The stations of the C. M. S. in 1834 are as follows: Teppana, commenced in 1815; John King's mission, Kerikeri, 1819; James Kemp, C. Baker, Pahiia, 1823; H. Williams, W. Williams, A. N. Brown, Waimate, 1831; W. Yate, and 7 English catechists and 3 English artisans.

In the general line and methods of instruction which have been adopted towards the natives in our schools, the aim has been, to render these subservient to the higher duties of religious teaching. The introduction of the catechisms, simple in their construction, and yet embracing, under easy native idiom, the all-important doctrines of the gospel, has been found most beneficial and pleasing; so that, whether believed or not, the truths which they teach are noised abroad; and there are few natives in the villages around but have thus heard much of them, while many have acquired the greater part of them, and can repeat them from memory."

The observance of the Lord's day is established by the natives among us: the slaves claim it as their right to rest from labor; and the masters have not been unwilling to concede to them this portion of their time. Knowledge is increased: there is much profession, and we hope some sincerity of heart among many who have, from time to time, heard from us the gospel.

"December 12, 1832:—"The good work of the Lord, which he has begun, is still prospering in the hands of his servants. Many of the natives, on the Lord's day, instead of working as formerly, assemble with us to offer up prayer and praise to the true God through Christ the way: some of them are, no doubt, seeking the good of their souls: others are requesting teachers to live with them, to instruct them and their children. This is a new thing to us. Years ago, they often requested missionaries to live with them, to supply them with axes, &c.; but now we trust that many are seeking the words of eternal life, and that applications for teachers are for their spiritual benefit. I hope our hearts and hands will be more and more engaged in making known to them the saving truths of the gospel."

It is in the contemplation of the committee to set up a printing press in New Zealand for the use of the mission, for the employment of which important instrument of good, when properly directed, there will be full scope in the present advanced state of the mission.

Mr. Yate subsequently writes—

"March 2.—I have completed the liturgy, catechisms, and hymns; and if all goes on as it is now proceeding, I shall complete all that is translated of the Scriptures: 1300 copies of each are struck off, which, with the binding, paper, &c. will come to nearly 500 pounds; a large sum, but much cheaper than the last edition: inasmuch as we had only 550 volumes of the last for 90 pounds, we have now 3300 volumes for 500 pounds."

In a letter, dated May the 21st, he writes—"I am happy to say I have at length finished printing." By the ship which brought this letter, he forwarded two copies of the works printed, bound in volumes. The following enumeration of them will be read with feelings of deep interest. May the perusal of those Scriptures which are given by inspiration of God be accompanied by the teaching and quickening influences of his Holy Spirit, that multitudes of New Zealanders may thereby be made wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus!

Among all the results of missionary labor, to have a good hope through grace in the hearts of those who are the subjects of it, is the most gladdening; since this, and the glory of God in this, is the very end of the mission, and of the trials and privations of the missionary in his work. Such fruits of their ministry among the New Zealanders have already, through grace, been gathered; and such continue to cheer the missionary in the way.

For an account of the Wesleyan missions, see MANAWA. NIESKY; a station of the U. E. on the island St. Thomas. It was commenced in 1753. In 1819, a terrible hurricane nearly destroyed the station. In 1829 new mission premises were completed.

NILGHERY HILLS. The Rev. H. Woodward, late one of the American missionaries in Ceylon, has furnished the following account of these celebrated hills.

"These are a part of the range of mountains extending along the western coast of Hindostan, from Cape Comorin to Surat. The place at which I resided, Kotengherry, is in north lat. 11° 19'. It is nearly ten years since these mountains were first explored by the English: it is not, however, more than five years since they were first resorted to by invalids, and not more than two since the fame of them reached Jaffa. Their discovery is an invaluable acquisition to the country: invalids, who were obliged to sacrifice much time and spend immense sums of money in order to obtain a change of air, may now, at a trifling expense, ascend this mountain, and secure more benefit from one year's residence there, than from two years' trip to England; that arising from the voyage excepted. It is, without doubt, one of the finest climates in the world: the daily variation of the thermometer, within the house, during the nine months of my residence, was not more than three or four degrees: during the hottest months, the mercury varied from 61° to 63° of Fahrenheit; and at the coldest, from 40° to 44°: in the open air, the variation would have been greater, especially in the cold season, as ice was frequently found in the morning."

"There are two places at which invalids reside—Kotengherry and Ootacamana. Kotengherry is but 15 miles from the foot of the hills, and but 6500 feet high; Ootacamana is 15 miles further up, and 1500 feet higher. On many accounts, Kotengherry is to be preferred as a residence for invalids."

"The first English settlers went to Kotengherry; but finding the inhabitants unwilling to part with their land, they went on to Ootacamana, where the natives neither cultivate nor claim the soil. The country immediately round about, more elevated, is more level, and on that account more eligible for a large settlement; and now, since the number of inhabitants has greatly increased, the place has become very gay, and of course more inviting to most persons than Kotengherry. The present number of buildings at this place is only eight; at Ootacamana probably five times that number; and as speculators prefer spending their money in erecting buildings at Ootacamana, it will not only continue to grow, but will ere long have a larger English population than any other place in India, the presidencies excepted."

J. B. Morehead, of the C. M. S., labors on the Nilgherryhills, having charge of several of the missionaries' children.

NOVA SCOTIA; a British province of North America, situated between the 43d and 46th parallels of N. lat. and between the 61st and 67th of W. lon. It is a peninsula, connected by a narrow isthmus with the continent, and is about 300 miles long; of unequal breadth, containing about 15,617 square miles. In 1827, the population was 153,843, of which number 30,000 were in Cape Breton. It is immediately dependent on the crown of Great Britain. The sum of 4000 pounds annually is devoted to the support of the poor in common schools. The Gospel Propagation society employs 30 or 40 missionaries among the destitute inhabitants of this province.

NUKUALOFA; a station of the W. M. S. on Tongataboo, one of the Friendly Islands. A great change has been effected by the gospel. A spirit of prayer has been largely poured out.

O.

OAHU; one of the Sandwich Islands, 130 miles north-west Hawaii, 46 long by 23 broad.

The town Honolulu contains about 6000 inhabitants. The missionaries of the A. B. C. F. M. commenced their mission on this island in 1820. (See SANDWICH ISLANDS, HONOLULU, &c.)

OCHEOIAS; a station of the B. M. S. in the island Jamaica. OCHIBWA; or CHIPPewa; Indians in the North-west territory, on the Chippewa river, in Michigan territory, and in Canada on the Utaua. Number according to Pike, 11,177; 2,049 warriors. The A. B.

C. F. M. have established a mission among that part of the tribe which reside near the south-west shore of lake Superior.

"A number of gentlemen connected with the American Fur company, who spend most of the year at their trading posts in that quarter, have repeatedly requested that a mission might be commenced there, and have made generous offers in aid of such an undertaking. These gentlemen are extensively acquainted with the Indians residing between lake Superior, and the head waters of the Mississippi, and exert much influence over large portions of them. They represent them to be numerous, and disposed to receive missionaries and teachers.

"So desirous were some of these traders to have a missionary reside among them, that when they came to Mackinac in the summer of 1830, they brought a boat especially for the purpose of accommodating a mission family, whom they had been encouraged to expect would be there to accompany them on their return. The committee, however, had not been able to obtain a suitable missionary for the service; but, in order that the gentlemen who had manifested so deep an interest in the object might not be wholly disappointed, it was thought expedient that Mr. Ayre, the teacher of the school at Mackinac, accompanied by one of the pupils as an interpreter, should return with them; which was done."

"Mr. Ayre collected and taught a small school a part of the year, labored as a catechist, as he had opportunity, and made some progress in acquiring the language. The information which he obtained, and the impression which this experiment made, were favorable to the prosecution of missionary labors in that quarter."

"Accordingly, during the last spring, Mr. William T. Boutwell, and Mr. Sherman Hall, then members of the theological seminary at Andover, were appointed to this field: and after being ordained they started, together with Mrs. Hall, on their journey about the middle of June, and reached Mackinac one month after."

"On their arrival at Mackinac, and after conference with Mr. Ferry and the traders, it was thought expedient for Mr. Boutwell to remain at that place one year, where he might aid Mr. Ferry in the ministerial labors of the mission, which was much needed, while he might enjoy as great facilities for acquiring the Ojibwa language as he would in the interior. He accordingly remained at that mission, while Mr. and Mrs. Hall, with Mr. Frederic Ayre, as teacher, and Mrs. Campbell, for a number of years an inmate of the mission family at Mackinac, a member of the church, and familiarly acquainted with the Ojibwa and as language teacher, proceeded, on the return of the traders, to the site of the contemplated mission, about 400 or 500 miles west or north-west from Mackinac."

"The missions among the Ojibwas at the present time, 1834, are La Pointe, Sherman Hall, missionary, John Campbell, mechanic, and their wives. Delia Cook and Sabrina Stevens, assistants. Yellow Lake, Frederic Ayre, catechist, and his wife, Joseph Town, teacher and mechanic, as a native teacher, proceeded, on the return of the traders, to the site of the contemplated mission, about 400 or 500 miles west or north-west from Mackinac."

"OKKAK; a station of the U. B. in Greenland, established in 1776. In 1834, at Okkak, missionaries, Knares, Sturman, Morhardt, and Korner. Congregation, 325. Sixty Lake, Edmund F. Ely, teacher."

"OLD HARBOR; a station of the B. M. S. in Jamaica. H. C. Taylor, missionary; 202 members."

"OMALLORE; a church of Syrian Christians, in Southern India. Connected with it are 638 families, and 2600 souls."

"ONA; an outpost of the L. M. S., in Siberia. William Swan, missionary."

"Mr. Swan, at the date of the last advice, was detained at St. Petersburg, in copying a manuscript of a greater part of the Scriptures, in the Manjur Tartar."

"ODOOVILLE; a populous parish, district of Jaffna, Ceylon, 5 miles north Jaffnapattam, and about two miles north-east Maneply. It stands on an extensive plain, covered with groves of palmyra, cocconut, and other fruit-trees, in the midst of which are many villages of natives and idol temples. The Rev. M. Winslow, from the A. B. C. F. M., arrived here in 1820."

"The missionaries now, in 1834, at Oodoville, are William Todd and George H. Appoth, and their wives. Mr. Winslow is on a visit to the United States. (See CEYLON.)"

"OORMAH LAKE, in Persia, near Armenia, where the Rev. J. Perkins, of the A. B. C. F. M., went in 1834 to begin a mission among the Nestorians on its shores."

"ORISSA; a province of Hindostan, belonging to the presidency of Bengal, lying in the eastern part of the peninsula, with the provincia of Bengal on the N., the Northern Circars on the S., the bay of Bengal on the E., and Gundwana on the W. The length is probably about 100 miles. The western part is almost an impassable wilderness of woods and jungles. A great part of it is extremely unhealthy. It has a population of 1,200,000 Hindoos and Mohammedans. There are missions of the General Baptists in this province."

"For further particulars respecting the Orissa mission, see CUTTACK, and POOREE."

"OSAGES. The Osage, a river of Misoury, rises in the country west of the state, about 97° W. lon. and 36° 30' N. lat. It flows into the state of Missouri, and joins Missouri river 133 miles above the Mississippi. It has a very winding course, is 397 yards wide at its mouth, and is navigable for boats 600 miles. Much of the land watered by it is very fertile. The two native tribes, the Great Osages and the Little Osages, live in separate settlements on the river, about 400 miles from its mouth. The Great Osages consist of about 3,500; the Little Osages, 1,700. About 150 miles S. W. of these settlements are the Osages of Arkansas, nearly 2,000 in number."

"A mission was established among the Osages by the United Foreign Missionary society. It was transferred to the care of the A. E. C. F. M. in 1826. Recent intelligence has been received at the missionary rooms that an interesting revival of religion had commenced among the Osages. Nothing of the kind has ever before occurred. This mission has been attended, through the warlike and roving habits of the Osages, with a less measure of success than any other of the missions of the Board. For particular notices, see UNION, HOPFIELD, and HARMONY. The following general notices were given in the last Report of the Board."

"Rev. William B. Montgomery has just died of the cholera."

"The station at Union is central and convenient for printing establishments for books and tracts in the Cherokee, Choctaw, Creek, and Osage languages. Mr. Worcester and Mr. Boudnot are expected to take charge of the press. No important changes have occurred in the religious state or prospects of this mission during the past year. In a white settlement near Harmony, where Mr. Jones has occasionally labored, a number of persons have been hopefully converted. The schools remain much as they were. During the past year, unsuccessful attempts have been made by the commissioners of the United States, to induce the Osages to enter into a treaty to sell the lands which they at present occupy, and remove to some kindred tribes on the Kansas and Platte rivers. Treaties of peace and friendship have been formed among a number of tribes north-east of the Osages, both among themselves, and between them severally and the Osages."

"OTUIHU; a village in New Zealand, visited by the missionaries of the L. M. S."

"OVAH; a kingdom on the island of Madagascar. The New Testament has been dispersed by means of schools through a considerable part of this kingdom."

"OXFORD; a station of the B. M. S. in Jamaica."

P.

"PAARL; a settlement in Cape Colony, South Africa, about 35 miles N. E. of Cape Town."

"The Rev. E. Evans, from the L. M. S., commenced a mission here in 1819, which was designed more particularly for the Hottentot slaves. Several years previous to its commencement, a chapel had been built, in which missionaries occasionally preached. Soon after the arrival of Mr. Evans, an A. M. S. was formed, to which the slaves contributed so liberally as to require restraint rather than incitement. Schools were established, in which, in 1823, more than 200 children and adults were instructed. The number of hearers in the Paarl and the vicinity are about 1100 whites and 1200 colored people. The Rev. Mr. Miles, of Cape Town, has lately visited Paarl, and the mission school here is well conducted. For the benefit of such as cannot attend the day school, an evening school, held on two days of the week, has been lately opened. A school-mistress has been engaged, at a small stipend, to instruct the female slaves and their children. At a public examination, which took place during the year 1826, the progress which had been made by the scholars was observed with great satisfaction. It is in contemplation, if funds can be provided, to establish schools in all the surrounding country of the district, as one means of counteracting Mohammedanism, which prevails in this vicinity."

"W. Elliott is now missionary at Paarl. Congregation on Sunday, 230; on week days, 110. Communicants, 32. Books and tracts distributed, 81."

"PALATSBOROP, formerly called Hooze Kraal; a settlement of Hottentots, Cape Colony, South Africa, in the district of George, three miles from the town of that name, and two from the sea. The L. M. S. commenced a mission here in 1813."

"Mr. Campbell gives the following account of its origin:—

"About 250 miles from Cape Town, my wagons encamped in the vicinity of George, a town then just commencing. Soon after my arrival there, I was visited by Dikkop, or 'Thickhead,' the Hottentot chief of Hooze Kraal, situated about three miles distant, together with about 60 of his people, who expressed an earnest desire that a missionary might be stationed at his residence. On asking his reason for desiring a missionary, he answered, it was that he and his people might be taught the same things that were taught to white people, but he could not tell what things these were. I then requested him to stay with us until sunset, when he would hear some of those things related by Cupido, who was a countryman of his, and my wagon-driver. Dikkop said all his people readily agreed to stay till evening. To Cupido they listened also with much attention the following morning. I inquired whether they were all desirous of having a missionary to settle among them, which was answered unanimously in the affirmative; but, like their chief, they could not assign any reason, except to be taught the same things which were taught to the white people. A very aged, miserable-looking man coming into the hut during the conference, with scarcely a rag to cover him, excited my attention: he came and stood by my side, kissed my hands and feet, and by most significant gestures expressed his extreme joy in the prospect of a missionary coming among them. His conduct having deeply interested me, I asked him whether he knew any thing about Jesus Christ. His answer was truly affecting—"I know no more about any thing than a beast."

"On Mr. Campbell's second voyage to South Africa, he again visited Hooze Kraal, in June, 1819. In his account of this visit he thus describes the strong change which had been effected by the blessing of God on the labors of the missionary, who had been a few months before removed to his heavenly rest:—

"As we advanced toward Hooze Kraal, the boors, or Dutch farmers, who had known me on my former journey in that part of Africa, would frequently assure me, that such a change had been produced on the place and people since I had left it, that I should not know it again. The nearer we approached the settlement, the reports concerning its rapid improvement increased, till at length we arrived on the spot, on the evening of June 2."

"Next morning, when the sun arose, I viewed, from my wagon, the surrounding scene, with great interest. Instead of bare, unproductive ground, I saw two long streets with square-built houses on each side, placed close together since I had left it, that I should not know it again. The nearer we approached the settlement, the reports concerning its rapid improvement increased, till at length we arrived on the spot, on the evening of June 2."

'This house is mine!' said he, 'and all that garden!' in which I observed there were peach and apricot trees, decked with their delightful blossoms, fig-trees, cabbages, potatoes, pumpkins, water-melons, &c. I then went across the street to the house of a person known by the name of Old Simeon—the very man who sat in such a wretched plight by my side in the hut when I first visited the place, and who then said he knew no more about any thing than a brute. I was informed that he had become a Christian, had been baptized, and named Simeon; and because of his great age, they called him Old Simeon. I found him sitting alone in the house, deaf and blind with age. When they told him who I was, he instantly embraced me with both hands, while streams of tears ran down his cheeks. 'I have done,' said he, 'with the world now. I have done with the world now! I am waiting till Jesus Christ says to me, Come! I am just waiting till Jesus Christ says to me, Come.'

The case of this singular monument of the grace of God was very well described by a missionary who visited Hooge Kraal, on his way to Betheldorp, soon after his conversion. He relates it thus:—
"On Tuesday evening, April 8th, 1817, before we left Hooge Kraal, an old man, about 90 years of age, prayed. He expressed great gratitude to God for sending his gospel to his nation, and that in his days, and particularly for making it efficacious to his own conversion.

"In his youthful days he was the leader of every kind of iniquity. He was a great elephant and buffalo hunter, and had some wonderful escapes from the jaws of the animal in the act of throwing the elephant, who endeavored to crush him to death; but he escaped. At another time, he was tossed into the air by a buffalo several times, and was severely bruised; the animal then fell down upon him; but he escaped with life. A few years ago, he was for some time to appearance dead; and was carried to his grave soon after, as is the custom in that climate; but, while the people were in the act of throwing the earth over him, he revived, and soon after recovered. The second time Mr. Pacalt preached at Hooge Kraal, he went from the meeting rejoicing, and saying, that the Lord had raised him from the dead three times, that he might hear the word of God, and believe in Jesus Christ, before he died the fourth time.'

"He was baptized last new-year's day, and was named Simeon. Mr. Pacalt told us that it was impossible to describe the old man's happiness on the occasion. Heaven's joy had filled his heart, and strengthened his weak frame, that he appeared as lively as a youth, although 90 years of age. He said, 'Now I am willing to die; yes, I would rather die than live, that I may go and live, forever and ever, with my precious Savior. Before, I was afraid to die. Oh, yes! the thoughts of it made my very heart to tremble; but I did not know God and Jesus Christ then. Now, I have no desire to live any longer; I am too old to be able to do any thing here on earth, in glorifying God, my Savior or doing good to my fellow-Hottentots. I served the devil upwards of eighty years, and was ready to go to everlasting fire; but through a black Hottentot, through infinite mercy, I shall go to everlasting happiness. Wonderful love! Wonderful grace! Astonishing mercy!'

The next thing which attracted my attention was the wall which surrounded the whole settlement, for the protection of the gardens from the intrusions of their cattle and of the wild beasts.

"A place of worship has also been erected, capable of seating 200 persons. On the Lord's day I was delighted to see the females coming into it, clothed neatly in white and printed cottons; and the men dressed like Europeans, and carrying their Bibles or Testaments under their arms; sitting upon benches, instead of the ground, as formerly, and singing the praises of God with solemnity and harmony from their psalm-books, turning in their Bibles to the text that was given out, and listening to the sermon with serious attention. I also found a church of Christ, consisting of about 45 believing Hottentots, with whom I had several times an opportunity of commemorating the death of our Lord.

W. Anderson is now missionary at Pacalstort. T. Edwards, assistant. Inhabitants, 83 men, 110 women, 93 boys, and 109 girls. A marked improvement in the people has taken place; attendance on public worship is more regular; and an unusual concern about spiritual things has been manifested. Communicants, 27. Adults baptized, 14. Scholars, 106. Sunday, 127. Infants, 71. A temperance society formed in 1831 has been the means of removing one of the greatest impediments to the moral and spiritual improvement of the Hottentots.

PADANG; a Dutch settlement on the west coast of Sumatra, 300 miles N. W. of Benocool. E. lon. 99° 46', S. lat. 0° 50'. Rev. C. Evans, of the B. M. S., established a mission at this place in 1821. Mr. N. M. Ward has lately removed his printing press from Benocool to Padang. He is preparing a new version of the Malay Scriptures.

PAHIA; a station of the C. M. S. in New Zealand, on the S. side of the bay of Islands. The mission was commenced in 1823.

Missionaries at Pahia in 1833, H. Williams, W. Williams, A. N. Brown, W. Fairburn and W. Puckey, catechists, Maria Coldham, M. Fry A. Williams, and Serena Davis, assistants. The mission is to a very prosperous state. (See New Zealand.)

PALANCOATAH; a fortress town in Tinnevely district, Carnatic country, Hindostan, about three miles from Tinnevely, 65 E. N. E. cape Comorin, and 200 S. W. Tanjore.

The Rev. Messrs. Rhenius and Schmil, and Mr. R. Lyon, country born, English assistant, David, native assistant, and 15 Tamil school-masters, of the C. M. S., commenced a mission here in 1820, and established a seminary for the education of native schoolmasters and catechists; the happy influence of which begins to be perceived, by enabling them to furnish competent teachers in the schools, which Mr. Hough had established previous to their arrival in 1800, and also to provide for this extensive establishment schools in different parts of the district.

Missionaries in Palamcottah in 1833, C. T. E. Rhenius, John J. Miller, Paul F. Schiller, and John Devasagayam. Native catechists, 110. Schools in 87 villages, 115 girls and 2,137 boys. The word of truth is making considerable progress.

PALKERRY CHURCH; a settlement of Syrian Christians, in Southern India. The people manifest a desire to receive the word of God.

PALMAS CAPE: the dividing point between the windward and leeward coasts, in West Africa. It is an open, elevated, and cultivated spot, and free from causes of disease. The Maryland Colonization society have established a colony on this point. The A. B. C. F. M. have begun a mission.

PANTURA; an outstation of the W. M. S. near Calcutra, in the Cingalese division of Ceylon.

PAPINE; a station of the B. M. S. in Jamaica, eight miles from Kingston.

PARAMARIBO; the capital of Surinam, or Dutch Guiana, South America. It is about 18 miles from the sea, on the river Surinam. About the year 1777, a mission was commenced in Paramaribo, by the U. B. M. In 1830, the congregation consisted of nearly 1,800 members. In 1828, the preaching of the gospel was attended with powerful and happy effects, and many were added to the Lord, of all ages and colors.

At Paramaribo in 1833, were Passiant, Graff, Boehm, Hartman, Schmidt, and Trese; on a visit to Europe, brother and sister Voigt; on their voyage thither, brother and sister Jacobs. Missionaries, 16. Converts, 3,353. Communicants, 1,200.

PAREGANNO; a village in the Deccan, Western India, where the missionaries of the C. M. S. labor.

PAREBO; a church of the Syrian Christians, built about 200 years ago, and well accommodated 600 persons.

PARRAMATTA; a town in New South Wales, the next in importance to Sydney, and 15 miles from it. Rev. Samuel Maraden, who has resided here, has accomplished much good. The inhabitants are between three and four thousand. The streets are regularly laid out, crossing each other at right angles. Here is a refuge for female convicts.

PASSAGE FORT; a station of the B. M. S. in Jamaica.

PATAGONIA; southern portion of South America, which William Arns and Titus Coan, of the A. B. C. F. M., visited in 1833-4. Report in respect to the expediency of immediately beginning a mission unfavorable.

PATNA; a populous city, 320 miles from Calcutta, capital of Bahar Hindostan. On the 17th of March, 1830, a "Ladies' Society for Native Female Education" was formed at Patna.

G. M. Francis is now the catechist at Patna.

PAWNEES; Indians on Platte river, about 250 or 400 miles from St. Louis, Missouri, where in 1833 Rev. J. Dunbar and Mr. S. Allis, of the A. B. C. F. M., were trying to commence a mission. Population, 12,000.

PERSIA. James Merrick, of the A. B. C. F. M., sailed from Bosh, August 20, 1834, to commence a mission in some point in Persia.

PHILIPPOLIS; a station of the L. M. S., South Africa, (so called from respect to the Rev. Dr. Philip,) which was formed a few years since, with the hope of reviving the mission to the Bushmen; for which purpose Jan Goeyman, a Hottentot teacher, was sent hither, but no discernible success attended his labor. As he thought an European missionary would succeed where he failed, Mr. Clark was appointed to this place.

An outstation, belonging to it was, in the course of the year 1826, attacked by a party of plundering Caffres, who, horrible to relate, destroyed no less than 31 Bush people, in order to get possession of their cattle. Mr. Clark having received information of this dreadful catastrophe, proceeded, as soon as he was able, to the spot, and removed the survivors to Philippolis. He had previously directed some Hottentots, belonging to the latter place, to pursue the murderers, in order, if possible, to recover the cattle; in which attempt they completely succeeded.

Inhabitants of Philipolis in 1833, 204 men, 410 women, 400 boys, 506 girls. G. A. Kolbe, missionary. Congregation, from 350 to 500. Communicants, 183. Candidates for baptism, 16. Scholars, 183. Books and tracts distributed, 318. One thousand persons have been vaccinated. The people manifest great attention to the ordinances.

PINANG, or PRINCE OF WALES'S ISLAND, (called by the Malays Pulo Pinang, or Betel-Nut Island), is an island in the East Indian sea, near the coast of Siam; lat. of its N. E. point, 5° 25' N., lon. 109° 19' E. It has an area of about 160 square miles, and a fine harbor. Its basis is a mass of granite. The western side affords abundance of ship timber for building. The remainder is extremely fertile, and yields large crops of pepper, coffee, rice, ginger, &c. The climate is temperate. George Town is the capital. Population of the island and dependencies, in 1822, was 51,207, chiefly Chinese and Malays. A mission was commenced at Pinang in 1819, by the L. M. S. From the report of 1831 we copy the following paragraph.

"The means of communicating the light of the gospel to the heathen, among whom the missionaries are laboring, are various. Some at present are only accessible through the press; others by the public proclamation of the glad tidings of salvation; while the chief means of doing good to the Chinese, is by visiting them from house to house, and by conversation, and preaching the gospel. This Mr. Dyer did every day, except Saturday and Sunday, during the early part of the last year. Sometimes he met with opportunities of proaching the gospel to an attentive audience, though such audience was never large."

T. Beighton and Samuel Dyer are now missionaries at Pinang. Mr. Beighton preaches regularly in Malay. Mr. and Mrs. Dyer continue their labors among the Chinese. There are six Chinese schools.

PLAATBERG; a station of the W. M. S. in South Africa, near the Maquasse mountains, north of the Yellow river, commenced in 1823. James Archbell and Thomas Jenkins are missionaries at Plaatberg. Congregation, 500 or 800. Members, 50. Scholars, 200. A press has been sent out. The mission is very prosperous.

POLYNESIA; from a Greek word signifying many islands; the name given by geographers to the great body of islands, scattered over the Pacific ocean, between Australasia and the Philippines, and the American continent. It extends from lat. 35° N. to 50° south; and from lon. 170° to 230° E.; an extent of 5,000 miles from N. to S. and of 3,600 from E. to W. It includes, therefore, the Sandwich islands, the Marquesas, Navigators, Society, Friendly, Georgian, Pelew, Ladrons, Mulgrave, Carolines, Pitcairn, &c.

TEMPLE OF THE IDOL DAGON, RANGOON. P. 1329.

TOWN OF BEER, MESOPOTAMIA.

APPROACH TO MARDEN, ON THE EUPHRATES.

POONAMALLEE; a village near Madras, Hindostan, where 40 attend as a congregation to the preaching of the Madras missionaries.

POOREE, or JUNOERNART; a station of the General Baptists, near the great temple of Juggernaut, on the coast S. of Cuttack, commenced in 1823. W. Eampton, long a faithful missionary, has rested from his labors. Mr. Sutton, from Balasore, has devoted a part of his time to this station.

PORT ELIZABETH; outstation to Bethelsdorp, of the L. M. S., South Africa.

Port Elizabeth in 1833, 1,100. Adam Robson, missionary. Congregation, 250; in Dutch, 50 or 60. Sunday scholars, 80 to 90; infant, 75.

PORT MARIA. This, with eight outstations of the Scottish Missionary society in Jamaica, has, under the care of Mr. Chamberlain, 270 catechumens, and 13 communicants; 21 were baptized in 1830-1.

PORT ROYAL; a station of the B. M. S. in Jamaica. John Clarke, missionary. Communicants, 171.

PRAGUAING; an outstation of the Serampore missions, near Arracan, Farther India.

PRINCE EDWARD'S ISLAND, or ST. JOHN'S; an island in the gulf of St. Lawrence, near the N. coast of Nova Scotia, to which government it was once annexed, but it has now a separate government. Population, 5,000. Lon. 44° 22' to 46° 32' W., lat. 45° 6' to 47° 10' N. It is well watered, and the soil is fertile. The S. P. G. have established a mission on the island.

PULICAT; a sea-port town in the Carnatic, Hindostan, 25 miles N. Madras. E. lon. 80° 27', N. lat. 13° 24'. The Rev. Mr. Kindlinger, from the N. M. S., arrived in 1821.

The Rev. Mr. Iron arrived in June, 1823, and has charge of the Dutch department. Since that time, Mr. Kindlinger has preached in Tamul, and has, in general, a numerous native congregation. He has been blessed in his catechizing of the people, and decisive evidence appears that the labor bestowed on the scholars has not been without fruit.

In 1825, this town was ceded by the Dutch to the British. A mission was commenced by the C. M. S. in 1827.

Edward Dent is now, 1833, missionary at Pulicat. No report has been received.

PUTAWATOMJIES; a tribe of Indians in the N. W. part of the United States, among whom Mr. and Mrs. Simmerwell, of the A. B. B., are about beginning a mission.

PUTNEY; a station of the B. M. S. in Jamaica, 18 miles from Kingston; 916 communicants.

Q.

QUILON, or COUTAN; a sea-port of Travancore, Hindostan, 88 miles N. W. of cape Comorin.

Inhabitants of Quilon in 1833, 40,000, half Hindoos, the remainder Mohammedans, Syrians, Parsees, and several Catholics. Language, Malayalam, but Tamul is understood. Seven native readers are employed; each has the charge of a number of villages. On Sabbath morning 50 adults and 30 youths attend. Schools, 24, with 570 scholars. Tracts have been largely distributed. Growing desire for education and prejudices diminishing.

A station was commenced here by the L. M. S. in 1821, and the Rev. Messrs. Smith and Crow, and several native readers, labored with much zeal and energy. The number of schools under their superintendence, in 1825, was eight; that of scholars, including 15 girls, who also received Christian instruction, 353; and all of them were in a prosperous state. About this time Mr. Smith was obliged, on account of ill health, to return home; and Mr. Crow, whose constitution was also unable to bear the climate of India, arrived in England, December 12, 1826.

On his departure from Quilon, the mission was placed under the superintendence of Mr. Ashton, assistant missionary from Nagerecoil. He has collected a native congregation, consisting of about 20 persons, who assemble every Sabbath afternoon, when a service is performed, in which he is assisted by the reader, Rowland Hill. The readers, besides visiting the bazars and other places of public resort, itinerate in the neighboring villages.

R.

RAIATEA, sometimes called Ulites; one of the Society islands, in the South Pacific ocean, about W. lon. 151° 30', S. lat. 16° 50'; 30 miles S. W. Hahine, and 30 in circuit, with many good harbors; containing about 1200 inhabitants.

"In 1823, George Bennet, Esq. and Rev. D. Tyerman, the deputation of the L. M. S., thus wrote: "In examining the ruined morais or temples at Opa, we could hardly realize the idea that six or seven years ago they were all in use; and were rather inclined to imagine these the ruins of some wretched idolatry, which had suffered its overthrow 15 or 20 centuries ago. In looking over the large congregation, and in seeing so many decent and respectable men and women, all conducting themselves with the greatest decorum and propriety, we have often said to ourselves, 'Can these be the very people who participated in the horrid scenes which we have heard described? nay, the very people who murdered their children with their own hands; who slew and offered human sacrifices; who were the very perpetrators of all these indescribable abominations?' To realize the fact is almost impossible. But though six or seven years ago they acted as if under the immediate and unrestrained influence of the most malignant demons that the lower regions could send to torment the world, we view them now in their houses, in various meetings, and in their daily avocations, and behold them 'clothed, and in their right minds.'"

On the subject of the instruction enjoyed by the natives, in connexion with the Raiatea mission, the deputation observe: "All the people, both adults and children, who are capable of it, are in a state of school instruction. Many of the men and women, and not a few of the children, can read fluently and with accuracy those portions of the sacred Scriptures which have been translated, and of course all the elementary books; the rest read in one or other of these elementary books; many can write, and several cipher. Such is the state of things, and such is the system of improvement that is now in operation, that not a single child or grown person can remain in this island unable to read. The children, comprising 350 boys and girls, assemble every morning at sunrise for instruction in a large house erected for the purpose; while the adults assemble at the same time in the chapel, Saturday and Sabbath mornings excepted, to read and repeat their catechisms. After the school hours are over, which is about eight o'clock, they go to their several occupations for the day."

No accounts from Raiatea have been of late received.

RAIVAIVI; a group of islands in the South Pacific ocean, at considerable distance from each other, viz.: Raivaivi, Rarofoa, Rimataru, Kutu, Kurulu, and Tupuai. The inhabitants resemble those of Tahiti, and speak a similar language. Till recently they were ignorant of God, gross idolaters, and addicted to crimes common to such a state, of ignorance and superstition. But the change produced calls alike for wonder and gratitude.

The Rev. Mr. Davies, of the L. M. S., arrived at Raivaivi, where three native teachers labor, on the fourth of February, 1826. On the following morning, it being the Sabbath, he attended an early prayer meeting, and found a tolerably large congregation assembled. The worship was conducted by two of the natives of the island, (one the son of a chief) each of whom read a chapter in the gospels and prayed. The congregation that assembled in the forenoon consisted of from 900 to 1000; many from the opposite side of the island having returned home, the congregation in the afternoon was much smaller. In the school he found 17 of the natives capable of reading in the Tahitian gospels. During his visit he preached three times to the natives; held a meeting with the baptized adults, in number 122; and admitted 17 candidates, after due examination, into church fellowship.

The name Austral is now given to these islands. No report has recently been received from this group.

RANGOON; a city of Birmah, in Pegu, 600 miles S. E. of Calcutta; lon. 95° 44' E. lat. 18° 47' N. It is the principal port of the Birman empire, and is situated on a branch of the Irrawaddy, 30 miles from the sea. Population, 12,000.

In January, 1807, the Rev. Messrs. Chater and Mardon, from the B. M. S., having consented to undertake an exploratory visit, arrived at Rangoon, and were received in the most friendly manner by some English gentlemen, to whom they had been recommended by a friend at Calcutta. They were also treated with great civility by the sloop-commander, or intendant of the port, and by one of the Catholic priests, who resided in the vicinity of the town. On the 23d of May they returned to Serampore, and expressed their most sanguine hopes of the establishment of a mission. Mr. Mardon, however, having subsequently declined the undertaking, on the plea of ill health, Mr. Felix Carey volunteered his services, and was chosen his successor. In November, Messrs. Chater and Carey, with their families, left Serampore, with appropriate, affectionate, and faithful instructions, and the most fervent prayers; and shortly after his arrival, Mr. Carey, who had previously studied medicine at Calcutta, introduced vaccination into Birmah, and after inoculating several persons in the city, was sent for by the viceroy, and at his order, performed the operation on three of his children, and on six other persons of the family.

The missionaries and their families were for some time involved in considerable difficulty, for want of a suitable habitation, and also of bread; in consequence of which the health of Mrs. Chater and Mrs. Carey was so seriously affected, that they were obliged to return to Serampore about the middle of May, 1808.

The medical skill of Mr. Carey procured him, however, high reputation among the Birmans, and also some influence with the viceroy. A dwelling-house for the missionaries and a place of worship were erected at Rangoon; and a handsome sum was subscribed by the merchants residing in the neighborhood towards the expense. But towards the end of 1809, Mr. Chater remarks, "So little inclination towards the things of God was evinced, even by the European inhabitants, that though the new chapel had been opened for worship on three successive Sabbaths, not an individual residing in the place came near it." At the same time he describes the aspect of affairs as very gloomy and discouraging, from the Birman government being embroiled in hostilities with the Siamese, and the country being in consequence involved in confusion. Soon afterwards the whole town of Rangoon, excepting a few huts and the houses of the two principal officers, was completely burnt down; and the capital of the empire shared a similar fate. It is stated by a British captain who happened to be there at the time, that 40,000 houses were destroyed; and before he came away, it was ascertained that no fewer than 280 persons had lost their lives. It seems to have been the work of an incendiary, as the flames burst out in several parts of the city at the same time. For the royal palaces, the palaces of the princes, and the public buildings, were all laid in ashes.

The general appearance of things now became worse and worse; and in the summer of 1811, Mr. Chater remarks: "The country is completely torn to pieces, as the Mugs and Rachmors have revolted against the Birman government; and the Birman themselves are divided into large parties under the different princes. Rangoon is threatened, and will most likely be attacked, though probably not till after the rainy season." Soon after this, Mr. Chater relinquished his station at Rangoon, and pitched at Colombo, in Ceylon, as the scene of his future labors.

Mr. Carey, now left alone, was busily employed in translating the Scriptures into the Birman language, till the autumn of 1812, when he visited Serampore, in order to put one or two of the gospels to press, and to consult with his father and brethren respecting the mission. At the end of November he returned with a very promising colleague, named Kerr, but who, in less than 12 months, was compelled by declining health to go back to Serampore. The differences with the Siamese having been adjusted, and the Birman government re-established, Mr. Carey was ordered in the summer of 1813, to proceed to the court of Ava, for the purpose of inoculating some of the royal family, by whom he was received with many marks of peculiar distinction. Unhappily, however, though Mr. Carey lost his wife and his children, the family being wrecked on their way to Bengal, to obtain a new supply of virus by order of the king, he was so insured that his return to Ava, as to accept the appointment of ambassador to Calcutta, for the purpose of arranging some differences which existed between the two governments. Thither he proceeded, and lived in a style of oriental magnificence: but his connexion with the Birman government was of short duration; and after having been subsequently employed by an eastern rajah, he returned to Serampore, where he was engaged in translating and compiling various literary works till the time of his death. The success of the mission will shortly be given.

The Rev. A. and Mrs. Judson, from the A. B. C. F. M., arrived at Rangoon in 1813, and found a home at the mission-house erected by Mr. Chater. The aspect of affairs at that period was truly discouraging. Mr. and Mrs. Judson applied themselves to the study of the Birman language, and their arrival, and found it attended by many difficulties; they succeeded, however, in preparing a catechism, and also a summary of Christian doctrines, which the present of a press and types from the Serampore brethren enabled them subsequently to print, by the assistance of Mr. Hough, who, with Mrs. Hough, joined them, October 15, 1816. Finding after this that they had paper sufficient for an edition of 800 copies of St. Matthew's gospel, they commenced, in 1817, this important work, as introductory to a larger edition of the whole New Testament.

Mrs. Judson was, also, able to collect from 15 to 20 females on the Sabbath, who were attentive while she read and explained the Scriptures; and four or five children committed the catechism to memory, and often repeated it to each other. In December, 1822, Mr. Judson, for the recovery of his health, and hoping to obtain the assistance of one of the Arrakanese lately converted at Chittagong, took a voyage to sea. Soon after his departure, some circumstances occurred which threatened the destruction of the mission; but, happily, the evil was averted. Not till July, however, did any intelligence arrive respecting Mr. Judson. The captain of the vessel in which he sailed stated, on his return, that he was not able to make Chittagong; that after being tossed about in the Bay of Bengal, he made a landing at a port north of Madras, on the sea-coast; and that Mr. Judson left the ship immediately for Madras, hoping to find a passage home from thence. About a month after, he reached Rangoon; previously to which, Mr. and Mrs. Hough had sailed for Bengal, and in four or five weeks Messrs. Colman and Wheelock arrived as conductors. A piece of ground was now purchased, and a place of worship was erected. On April 4th, 1819, Mr. Judson says: "To-day, the building of the Zayat being sufficiently advanced for this purpose, I called together a few people who live around us, and commenced public worship in the Birman language. I say commenced, for though I have frequently roared and discoursed to the natives, I have never before conducted a course of exercises which deserved the name of public worship, according to the usual acceptation of that phrase among Christians; and though I began to preach the gospel as soon as I could speak intelligibly, I have thought it hardly becoming to apply the term preaching (since it has acquired an appropriate meaning in modern usage) to my imperfect, desultory exhortations and conversations. The congregation to-day consisted of 15 or 20 persons, all besides children. Much disorder and inattention prevailed, most of them not having been accustomed to attend Birman worship. The Lord's name, his blessing on attending, and the glory will be his."

After Mr. Judson had thus commenced public preaching, Mrs. Judson resumed her female meetings, which were given up, from the scattered state of the Birman around them, at the time of their government difficulties. They were attended by thirteen young married women. One of them said she appeared to herself like a new-born babe, just beginning to see. And another affirmed that she believed in Christ, prayed to him daily, and asked what else was necessary to make her a real disciple of Christ. "I told her," says Mrs. Judson, "she must not only say that she believed in Christ, but must believe with all her heart." She again asked what were some of the evidences of believing with the heart. I told her the manner of life would be changed; but one of the most evidences she could obtain would be, when others came to quarrel with her, and use abusive language, if, so far from retaliating, she felt a disposition to bear with, to pity, and to pray for them. The Birman women are particularly given to quarrelling; and to refrain from it would be a most decided evidence of a change of heart. About this time the missionaries had some interesting visitors; and among them, a young man, described as thirty-five years old, no family, middling abilities, quite poor, obliged to work for his living, who came, day after day, to hear the truth; Moug Shway Oo, a young man of pleasant exterior and of good circumstances, and Moug Shway Doan.

The missionaries having been for some time satisfied concerning the reality of his religion, voted to receive him into church fellowship; and, on the following Sabbath, Mr. Judson remarks, "After the usual course, I called him before me, read, and commented on an appropriate portion of Scripture, asked him several questions concerning his faith, hope, and love, and made the baptismal prayer, having concluded to have all the preparatory exercises done in the Zayat. We then proceeded to a large pond in the vicinity, the bank of which is graced with an enormous image of Gaudama, and there administered baptism to the first Birman convert." This man was subsequently employed by the missionaries as a copyist, with the primary design of affording him more ample instruction. In November, two other Birman converts, Moug Bysay, a man who, with his family, had lived near them for some time, had regularly attended worship, had learned to read, though 50 years old, and a remarkable moral character; and Moug Thalhah, who was superior to the generality, had read much more, and had been for some time under instruction,—applied by means of very interesting statements for baptism, which was administered by their particular request at sunset, November 7. A few days after, the three converts held the first Birman prayer meeting at the Zayat of their own accord.

In the midst of these pleasing circumstances, Mr. Wheelock, who had long been unwell, left Rangoon, and soon afterwards died; and so violent a spirit of persecution arose, that the Zayat was almost deserted, and the young king, Mr. Colman, determined on a private, memorial to the young king. As the emperor, who had not yet approached, at present, the missionaries resolved to offer one appropriate to their character—the Bible, in six volumes, covered with gold leaf, in Birman style, each volume being inclosed in a rich wrapper.

After an anxious and perilous voyage, they obtained an introduction to the king, surrounded by splendors exceeding their expectation, when, after a long conference, Moug Zab, the private minister of state, interpreted his royal master's will in the following terms: "In regard to the objects of your petition, his majesty gives no order. In regard to your sacred books, his majesty has no use for them; take them away." After a temporary revival of his hopes, the missionaries found that the policy of the Birman government, in regard to the toleration of any foreign religion, is precisely the same with the Chinese, that it is quite out of the question, without the sanction of the emperor, who embrace a religion different from his own, will be exempt from punishment; and that they, in presenting a petition to that effect, had been guilty of a most egregious blunder—an unpardonable offence.

In February, they returned to Rangoon, and after giving the three disciples a full understanding of the dangers of their condition, found, to their great delight, that they appeared animated in zeal, and avied with each other in trying to explain away difficulties, and to convince the teachers that the cause was not quite desperate.

After much consideration it was subsequently resolved that Mr. Colman should proceed immediately to Chittagong, collect the Arrakanese converts, who speak a language similar to the Birman, and are under the government of Bengal, and form a station to which new missionaries might first repair, and to which his fellow-laborers should flee with those of the disciples who could leave the country, if it should be rendered rash and useless to continue at Rangoon; and that Mr. and Mrs. Judson should remain there, in case circumstances should prove more propitious.

Private worship was now resumed in the Zayat, the front doors being closed, the service afterwards it was conducted in a room previously occupied by Mr. Colman, who died soon after his arrival at Chittagong, was appropriated to this purpose. Inquirers increased, notwithstanding surrounding difficulties and prospective sufferings, and five persons were baptized. Among these were Mah Men-shay, the principal one of Mrs. Judson's female company, and Moug Shway-gong, a teacher of considerable distinction, who appeared on his first acquaintance with the missionaries to be half-deaf and half-sceptic, and who had for a long time engaged in disputation with them. A sixth was added to this sacred community, after the missionaries had visited Bengal in consequence of the distressing state of Mrs. Judson's health.

Mrs. Judson's malady increasing, she was compelled, in August, to embark for Bengal on her way to America, and her husband was left at Rangoon alone. Two attempts were made upon the life of Moug Shway-gong; but, provisionally, he escaped. Moug Thalhah, the second convert, expired after an illness of 19 hours. Three more persons were baptized. Mr. Judson was much refreshed by the arrival of Dr. and Mrs. Price; but his expectations of finishing the New Testament without interruption were blasted by the arrival of an order from the king, summoning Dr. Price to Ava, on account of his medical skill; and on August 25, he left Rangoon, and the doctor, hoping to be able to gain some footing in the capital and the palace, Mr. Hough superintended the mission in the interim.

In December, 1823, Mrs. Judson returned, and proceeded with Mr. Judson, who had during her absence been making preparations for that purpose, to Ava. In the May following, the war broke out between the Bengal and Birman governments, and during the greater part of the continuance of Mr. Judson's mission, he resided at the mission, and in the vicinity of Ava; Mrs. Judson, however, remained at liberty, and was permitted, though under difficult circumstances, to minister in some degree to the wants of her suffering husband. At the close of the war she returned with him to Rangoon; from whence, in the latter part of June, 1826, with a view to the formation of a new missionary station, they proceeded to Amherst, a place which was first suggested for the site of a new town, but at that time a wilderness, with the exception of a few bamboo huts, erected for the accommodation of part of a regiment of sepoy and a few natives. Having left Mrs. Judson in the place as comfortable as circumstances would permit, Mr. Judson returned to Rangoon, and proceeded with the envoy to Ava, as interpreter. Mrs. Judson, as soon as was practicable, commenced a private school, and was attended by a number of children of the natives. But after an intermittent fever of nearly a month's continuance, this excellent and devoted woman closed her eyes in death, in the absence of her affectionate and zealous husband.

HAROTOGNA; one of the Hervey islands, in the Pacific ocean, about 19° S. lat., 159° W. lon., containing 6,000 inhabitants.

For an account of the mission on this island, see GNATANGHA, AVARUA, and AROBAGNI.

RED RIVER SETTLEMENT; a trading establishment of the Hudson's Bay company, on Red river, about 50 miles S. of its entrance in lake Winnipeg, which is defined by fort Douglas. It is 320 miles in length. It was formed in 1812, and contains about 700 settlers, besides Canadians and half-breeds, who are very numerous. W. lon. 98°, N. lat. 49° 40'.

In 1820, the Rev. John West, chaplain to the company, established a school for the benefit of the Indians, aided by 100 pounds from the C. M. S. The success of his attempt was such that the society sent laborers to his aid. Two places of worship have since been erected. In the midst of much outward distress, it appears, from the missionaries' accounts, that their ministry has been attended by many encouraging circumstances.

The present state of the Red River mission is prosperous. REGENT; a town of liberated negroes, Sierra Leone, Western Africa, six miles S. E. of Freetown, in the Mountain district. It has a healthy and highly romantic situation. In 1823, the number of liberated Africans was more than 2,000; a large stone church 80 feet by 60 feet, had been erected. From 1816 to 1823, the Rev. W. A. B. Johnson labored in this place, with great energy and success.

The Christian Institution, established at Leicester Mountain, was removed to this place, in 1820, with the design of rendering it a seminary, in which the most promising youths in the colony may be educated for schoolmasters and laborers in the different tribes. This institution has since been removed to Fourah Bay.

The Rev. Mr. Johnson died, May 3, 1823, much esteemed and lamented by the community around him, and especially by multitudes of the once wretched and degraded sons and daughters of Africa, whom he was the instrument of bringing out of darkness into marvellous light. Various laborers have since that period been employed at this place, but the trials that have arisen invest it with a deep and melancholy interest.

Mr. Betts thus speaks of the two classes of children of which the schools now consist:—

"The behavior of the liberated children is as good as can reasonably be expected from poor children, on whose tender minds the first impressions were made by the errors and vices of heathenism. I have known the regular number of communicants attending the Lord's supper who were born of liberated parents, and have been reared in the town; these last appear more intelligent, frank, and happy, and have the air of liberty in their whole deportment; while the others exhibit, in their downcast, timid, and suspicious mien, the appearance of a servile and oppressed race."

I regret that there are many nice little girls, belonging to the people of the town, who have no instruction, there being no female here to take charge of a girls' school. A little while previous to that trying dispensation of Providence by which I was deprived of my dear wife, we had frequently a number of pleasant little children come up into our piazza, asking us to let them come to school. A steady and clever woman, capable of acting as schoolmistress, would be very valuable."

At Christmas, David Noah gives the following view of the station:— "The regular number of communicants attending the Lord's supper at this time, is 100; and their outward conduct, for the most part, is good. The general attendance of the people at divine service, on the Sabbath day, is encouraging; but on week days very few attend, in consequence of many of the men working at Freetown. Daily morning and evening service is regularly kept, and divine service three times on Sundays. The present state of Regent is much to be lamented. We are now as sheep without a shepherd. The harvest truly is plenteous, but the laborers are few: may we pray that the Lord will be pleased to send out more laborers into his harvest."

SADAMAHL; a subordinate station to Dinagepore, 20 miles N. W. of that station, and 250 miles from Serampore, under the care of the Serampore Baptists.

H. Synlyie is missionary at Sadumahl, S. Barcoo, assistant. Communicants, 16. People, who are chiefly Mohammedans, listen with much attention. No fruit has yet appeared. Schools are improving. SANDWICH; a station under the Serampore Baptists, 65 miles N. E. of Serampore, commenced in 1805. H. Synlyie, missionary, with two native assistants. Mr. Ignatius Fernandez, a very faithful native preacher at this station, died on the 26th of December, 1830, in the arms of his brethren at Serampore.

J. Parry is now missionary at Salehbugny, with four native assistants. In four schools, there is an average attendance of 242 boys, and 12 Christian families. The station possesses peculiar advantages for the dissemination of truth.

SALEM; a town of Western India, of 60,000 inhabitants. N. lat. 12°, E. lon. 79°; surrounded by populous villages. A mission was commenced in this place in 1827 by the London Missionary society.

George Walton is now missionary at Salem. One native preacher, and one native assistant. Two Tamil services are continued on Sunday. About 200 poor people receive alms on Monday. Services are also held during the week in Canarese and Telogoo. Communicants, five. English scholars, 30; Telogoo, 43; Tamil, 242. The late missionary, Henry Crisp, though early cut off, labored not in vain.

SALEM; a station of the W. S. among the Hotentots of South Africa. The mission is represented as in a very promising state. During the year 1831, the children of the school repeated 13,826 verses of the Bible, and 2,383 hymns.

SALONICHI; the ancient Thessalonica, in Macedonia. Mr. Wolfe, who lately visited this place, found about 22,000 Jews, and was informed there were about 60,000 on the confines. He circulated more

The Rev. C. L. F. Haesael has lately departed for the colony, having tendered his services to the society with an express view to the education of the African youths. The frequent losses which the society has sustained, in the removal, by sickness or death, of persons employed in the mission, have hitherto been an obstacle to the efficiency of the institution. The subject has for some time occupied the attention of the committee, and they have come to the fixed determination of prosecuting, by all means in their power, and in any place, whether in Europe or in Africa, which may ultimately prove most eligible, the education of intelligent and pious natives, with the view of their becoming Christian teachers among their countrymen. In pursuance of this plan, they have placed two African youths under the care of a clergyman in the west of England.

The following is the report from Regent, of March 25, 1834. Average congregation, 650; week day, 180. Communicants, 180. Candidates, 115. Day scholars, 325; evening, 63; Sunday, 158. Population, 1699. Instruction is much valued by the people. On Sunday, the church is crowded even to the doors.

RHIO; a station of the N. M. S. in Eastern Archipelago. Wentink, missionary.

RICE LAKE; a small lake in Upper Canada, where the A. M. M. S. have a mission. The following account we take from the Report of the Canada Conference Missionary society:—

"The commencement of this great work was at Hamilton, Newcastle district, during the sitting of the conference in September last. About twenty attended on the means of instruction with great attention for several days, and showed an increasing concern for the comforts of this life, and the more arduous of the native Christians, who, while their religious friends were engaged in prayer on their behalf, the whole number of twenty professed to experience a change."

"On the return of these young converts to their friends, two native Christians, Beaver and Moses, were employed to accompany them, for the purpose of strengthening their faith, and explaining to their pagan brethren the religion of Christ. They met a large body of them on an island in Rice lake, and here, for several days, they exhorted the multitude to repentance and faith in the Saviour. The effects were, that those who practised enchantments threw away their 'medicine bag,' the use of spirits was discontinued, they became more cleanly in their apparel, and decent in their mode of living, and the wranglings of drunkenness were exchanged for the 'good will' of the gospel and the devotions of religion. The mode of instruction now pursued was, to enlighten some of the more experienced of the native Christians, who, with the assistance of our ministers, taught them to memorize in their own language, certain portions of the Scriptures, such as the ten commandments and the Lord's prayer. As often as the converts have been instructed in these portions, as well as in the nature of the ordinances, they have been admitted to baptism, and afterward to the Lord's supper. Their love for the word is ardent, and they improve every opportunity of hearing it; and for this purpose they generally attend our quarterly visitations. Sometimes the itinerant preachers visit their encampments, where they are sure to find a place set apart for religious worship, built of branches and barks of trees. Here the missionary explains to them the truths of religion by comparisons, and in language adapted to their capacity. Three of these Indian chapels are now standing on three islands in different parts of Rice lake, where these Christians of the woods hold their devotions when encamped in those places. This body have often expressed their wishes for a school, and they are also earnestly desirous for a home, where they may cultivate the soil, and enjoy more regularly the means of grace."

RIO BUENO; a station of the B. M. S., on the island Jamaica, 16 miles from Kingston.

ROBY TOWN; a station of the L. M. S. on Tahiti, one of the Georgian islands. W. Henry, missionary.

RUNGPORE; a station of the Serampore Baptists, 40 miles E. by N. of Dinagepore, begun in 1832. Jones, missionary.

than 200 Bibles and Testaments among them, and stuck up a proclamation on the walls, briefly declaratory of the gospel. In a few hours, 2000 Jews assembled around, and read it.

Rev. Messrs. Dwight and Schaeffer, of the mission at Constantinople, visited Salonichi in 1833, and spoke in warm terms of the missionary facilities held out there.

SANDY LAKE; a station of the A. B. C. F. M. among the Ojibwas, in Michigan territory. E. F. Ely, teacher. A school has been established. Mission commenced in 1833.

SANDWICH ISLANDS. These islands were discovered by captain Cook, about a half a century since, and named, in honor of his patron, the earl of Sandwich, first lord of the admiralty, the SANDWICH ISLANDS. They are 10 in number; eight are inhabited, and two are barren rocks, principally useless to the fishermen. They lie within the tropic of Cancer, between 15° 50' and 22° 29' N. lat., and between 154° 53' and 160° 15' W. lon. from Greenwich, about one third of the distance from the western coast of Mexico towards the eastern shores of China. They are larger than the Society islands, or any of the neighboring clusters. The following table gives the length, breadth, and area.

Name.	Length.	Breadth.	Area.	Name.	Length.	Breadth.	Area.
Hawaii,	97	5	4000	Ranai,	17	9	130
Mau,	45	29	600	Molokai,	40	7	170
Kauai,	46	23	520	Oahu,	46	23	620
Kahurawa,	14	8	60	Nihau,	20	7	8

Taura and Morikini, barren rocks. Hawaii (Owhyhee) resembles in shape an equilateral triangle. It is the most southern of the whole, and on account of its great elevation is usually the first land seen from vessels approaching the Sandwich islands. The altitude of this mountains is about 15,000 feet. The greatest part of the land capable of cultivation is found near the sea-shore; along which the towns and villages of the natives are thickly sown. The population is about 85,000. Maui is situated in latitude 20° N. and lon. 157° W. At a distance it appears like two distinct islands, but on nearer approach a low isthmus about 9 miles across is seen uniting the two peninsulas. The whole island is entirely volcanic. The inhabitants are 18,000 or 20,000. Kaharua is low, and is destitute of almost every species of verdure. There are but few settled residents on the island. Raihi has about 2000 inhabitants, and Molokai 3000. Oahu is a beautiful island, and very romantic and fertile. The whole island is volcanic, and, in many parts, extinguished craters of volcanoes appear. The highest mountain of Honolulu is the best, and indeed the only secure one at all times, in the Sandwich Islands, and is more frequented by foreign vessels than any other. Sometimes more than 30 are lying at anchor at the same time. It is the frequent residence of the kings and principal chiefs. The population of Oahu is about 20,000. Kaihi is a mountainous island, and exceedingly romantic in its appearance. The population is about 12,000. Nihaui is a small island, and has but few inhabitants.

The climate of the Sandwich Islands is not insubstantial, though warm and debilitating to an European constitution. Here is no winter; and the principal variation in the uniformity of the seasons is occasioned by the frequent and heavy rains, which usually fall between December and March, and the prevalence of a rather variable wind during the same season. The soil is rich in those parts which have long been free from volcanic eruptions. The natives are in general rather above the middle stature, well formed, with fine muscular limbs, open countenances, and features frequently resembling those of Europeans. Their gait is graceful, and sometimes stately. Their complexion is a kind of olive, and sometimes reddish brown. At the time of the discovery, in 1778, Captain Cook estimated the population at 400,000. They did not now exceed 130,000, or 150,000. The rapid depopulation, which has taken place within the last 50 years, is to be attributed to the frequent and depopulating wars, to the ravages of a disease introduced by foreigners, and to the awful effects of infanticide. The local situation of the Sandwich Islands is very important. They are frequently resorted to by vessels navigating the northern Pacific. On the north coast are situated the islands of Kamoharui and the neighboring coast, to the north-west the islands of Japan, due west are the Marian Islands, China, &c., and on the east California and Mexico.

The circumstances which led to the establishment of the American mission on these islands, and of the departure of the missionaries, are thus described in the Missionary Herald.

"For several years past, (1830) the eyes of the Christian community have been fixed upon Hawaii, and the neighboring islands, as the inviting field for missionary labor. Attention was first drawn to this most delightful cluster in the northern Pacific by the fact, that some of the natives, providentially cast upon our shores, were receiving the advantages of a liberal and Christian education, and had apparently become the subjects of that spiritual change, which alone could fit them to be useful to their countrymen in the highest sense. The hope that they might return to their native islands, accompanied by faithful missionaries, and bearing the offers of mercy to ignorant and perishing multitudes, was greatly strengthened by the wonderful displays of divine grace in the islands of the southern Pacific. The lamented Obookiah was anxiously looking for the day when he should embark on this voyage of benevolence and of Christian enterprise. Though it seemed good to the Lord of missions that his young servant should not be employed, as he had been desired by himself and others, but should be called to the enjoyments of a better world, divine wisdom had prepared, as we trust, other agents to aid in accomplishing the same blessed design.

"The period arrived, soon after the last annual meeting, for sending forth a mission, which had been thus contemplated; and which had excited the liveliest interest among the Christian community. The passage having been engaged, and other preparatory arrangements made, the mission family assembled in Boston, on the 12th of October. It consisted of twenty-two persons, and presented a most interesting collection, rarely if ever surpassed on a similar occasion. The Rev. Messrs. Bingham and Thurston had been ordained as ministers of the gospel. Mr. Daniel Chamberlain, of Brookfield, Massachusetts, a farmer in the prime of life, who, by his own industry and good management, was placed in very eligible worldly circumstances; Dr. Thomas Holman, who had just finished his education for the practice of medicine; Mr. Samuel Whitney, a student in Yale college, capable of being employed as a catechist, schoolmaster, or mechanic; Mr. Samuel Ruggles, a catechist and schoolmaster; and Mr. Eliza Loomis, a printer, having previously offered themselves for this service and been accepted, went forth to instruct the apostle of civilized communities, as well as the blessings of the gospel. Mr. Chamberlain had been the head of a family for 13 or 14 years, and took with him a discreet and pious wife and 5 promising children. The other persons who have been named had formed recent matrimonial connexions, and obtained, as helpers in the work, well educated females, of the finest character for piety and virtue. To this goodly company were added Thomas Hoppe, William Tennoce, and John Honoro, natives of the Sandwich Islands, who had been educated at the Foreign Mission school, instructed in the doctrines and duties of Christianity, and made partakers, as was charitably hoped, of spiritual and everlasting blessings.

"On Saturday, October 23d, the mission family embarked on board the brig Thaddeus, captain Andrew Blanchard.

"It is proper to mention here, with expressions of gratitude to the supreme Disposer, the astonishing change which took place at the Sandwich Islands just at the time the missionaries were embarking at Boston. To the surprise of all who had been acquainted with those islands, the government and the people unanimously, or nearly so, determined to abandon their idols, and to commit them with all the monuments of idolatry to the flames. This was done at Hawaii, then at Oahu and then at Kauai, with no dissent, much less opposition, except that in the former of these islands a chief of secondary influence stood aloof from the whole proceeding, and preserved an idol which had been presented to him by Tamahamaha. The accounts, given by eye-witnesses, are perfectly explicit and harmonious, as to these facts.

Tamoree, king of Kauai, expressed himself as being exceedingly desirous that missionaries should come and teach the people to read and write, as had been done in the Society Islands. This he did in conversation with American sea-captains, and wrote a letter to the same effect by the vessel which brought this intelligence, addressed to his son at Cornwall. This son, though not attached to the mission, sailed with the missionaries, and professed a desire to befriend them, and to promote the cause of truth among his countrymen. It is hoped, that he was received by his father in health and peace, several months before the above-mentioned letter, the principal object of which was to solicit his return, arrived in this country.

"The religious meeting which brought this intelligence, had this surprising result, was the continually repeated rumor of what had been done in the Society Islands, and the continually repeated assurance of our sea-captains and sailors, that the whole system of idolatry was foolish and stupid. Thus has a nation been induced to renounce its gods by the influence of Christian missionaries, who reside at the distance of nearly 3,000 miles across the ocean. Thus, while the gospel is becoming the power of God and the wisdom of God to many in the islands of the southern Pacific, the distant rumor of these blessed results has made the idolaters of the northern Pacific ashamed of their mummeries, and consigned to the flames the high places of cruelty, the altars, and the idols together."

From the very interesting letter which the missionaries wrote on their arrival, we extract the following:

"July 23, 1830.—Far removed from the loved dwellings of Zion in our native land, surrounded with pagans and strangers, we would lift the voice of grateful praise to our covenant Father, and call on our patrons and friends to rejoice, for the Lord had comforted his people, and ministered unto us an open and abundant entrance among the heathen. But here we see no altars of abomination, nor bloody rites of superstition; the people, by the blessing of Providence, have renounced idolatry, and to prepare the way for the nobler institutions of his true religion."

"While we were tossing on the waters of the Atlantic, and while the church was on her knees before the Healer of prayer, he was casting down the vanities of the heathen, demolishing the temples of paganism, and holding in derision the former pride and disgrace of this people. We waited by the propitious gates of heaven, we passed the dangerous goal of nearly 3000 miles across the ocean. On the 30th of January we and on the 30th of March arrived off the shore of these long lost and long neglected 'Isles of the Gentiles.' But how were our ears astonished to hear a voice proclaim—'In the wilderness prepare ye the way of Jehovah; make straight in the desert a highway for our God!' How were our hearts agitated with new, and various, and unexpected emotions, to hear the interesting intelligence—'TAMAHAMAHUA IS DEAD; THE TABOOS ARE BROKEN; THE IDOLS ARE BURNED; THE MORALS ARE DESTROYED; AND THE PRIESTHOOD ABOLISHED.'

This victory was achieved by that arm alone which sustains the universe. He who in wisdom has ordained that no flesh should glory in his presence, has saved us from the danger of glorying in the triumph, and taught us with adoring views of his majesty to 'stand still and see the salvation of God.' Long indeed did we expect to toil, with slow and painful progress, to undermine the deep-laid foundations of the gross idolatry. But He whose name alone is Jehovah, looked upon the blood-stained superstition, erected in insult to divine purity, and, without even the winding ram's horns of a consecrated priest, it sinks from his presence and tumbles into ruins; and he commands us, as the feeble followers of the Captain of salvation, to go up, 'every man, straight before him,' and, 'in the name of our God, to set up our banner.

On the 19th of November, 1822, a second reinforcement, consisting of 20 persons, sailed from New Haven, Connecticut, to join the mission at these islands. They arrived in safety. Though the missionaries have been called to experience trials, yet, on the whole, it has been, probably, successful beyond a parallel in the annals of missions.

On the 28th of December, a third reinforcement to the mission at the Sandwich Islands sailed from New Bedford, in the ship New England, captain Parker, bound to the Pacific. The members of the reinforcement were the Rev. Messrs. Dwight Baldwin, Reuben Tinker, and Sheldon Dibble, missionaries, and Mr. Andrew Johnstone, who is to be associated with Mr. Chamberlain as superintendent of secular concerns, in order that the latter may have more time for inspecting the schools. These brethren were all accompanied by wives. The instructions of the prudential committee were delivered to the missionaries by the late corresponding secretary, at New Bedford, on the evening of December 22d, and were followed by some other appropriate exercises."

In 1832, a fourth reinforcement of 19 persons, and in 1833, a fifth of 5 persons, arrived at the Sandwich Islands. From the last report of the Board presented October, 1834, a third reinforcement to the mission at the Sandwich Islands sailed from New Bedford, in the ship New England, captain Parker, bound to the Pacific. The members of the reinforcement were the Rev. Messrs. Dwight Baldwin, Reuben Tinker, and Sheldon Dibble, missionaries, and Mr. Andrew Johnstone, who is to be associated with Mr. Chamberlain as superintendent of secular concerns, in order that the latter may have more time for inspecting the schools. ISLAND OF MAUI. Lahaina, William Richards, Lorrin Andrews, and Ephraim Spaulding, missionaries, and their wives. Aloozo Chapin, M. D., physician, and wife, and Maria C. Ogden. Wailuku, Jonathan S. Green and Reuben Tinker, missionaries, and their wives.

ISLAND OF MOLOKAI. Kaunaloa, Harvey R. Hitchcock and Lowell Smith, missionaries, and their wives.

ISLAND OF HAWAII. Honolulu, Hiram Bingham and Ephraim W. Clark, missionaries, Gerrit P. Judd, M. D., physician, Levi Chamberlain, superintendent of secular concerns, Andrew Johnstone, teacher of a charity school, Stephen Shepard and Edmund H. Rogers, printers, and their wives. Waialua, John S. Emerson, missionary, and wife.

ISLAND OF KAUAI. Waimea, Samuel Whitney and Peter J. Gulick, missionaries, and their wives. Hanalei, Alexander and Benjamin W. Parker, missionaries, and their wives; stationers assigned to them since their return from Washington islands not known. Mr. Ruggles, missionary, and Mrs. Ruggles, after 12 years' labor, and Mr. Fuller, printer, who went out with the last reinforcement, have been compelled to return.

home on account of ill health. The late distinguished and Christian queen, Kaahumanu, on her dying bed, named Kiana as her successor. The young king, however, virtually abrogated some of the most salutary laws, and on being remonstrated with by the pious chieflain Hoapili, publicly declared that he took the reins of government into his own hands, and the power of life and death. Yet he still recognised Kiana as his agent for transacting business. He has also uniformly treated the missionaries in the most friendly manner. As soon as it became known, however, that the laws were relaxed, there was a falling-off in the schools and congregations; the Sabbath began to be profaned by sinful recreations. Not a few resumed their old habits of intemperance, and it soon became obvious that there had been a lamentable change in the moral influences which had been operating on the nation.

At each of the stations, preaching has been continued at stated times; also at a number of outstations. At Kaialoa, the attendance in the morning has been about 700, afternoon 400; at Hilo 800 and 400; at Waialuku 800 to 1000 and 200; Honolulu, 1000. A new meeting-house has been built at Waialua. Protracted meetings have been held at Waimea, Kaawaaloa, and Hilo, on Hawaii, and at Waialua. At Hilo, manifest good effects resulted.

The number of natives who were able to read with more or less facility in June, 1833, was,

Kaialua,	1,099	Kaawaaloa,	500
Kaawaaloa,	2,500	Honolulu,	3,100
Hilo,	2,859	Waialua,	1,600
Waimea,	3,000	Kaui,	2,977
Lahaina,	1,513
Waialuku,	731	Total	20,154

There is still a great deficiency of books adapted to schools. Select schools have been established at most of the stations, which are taught by the missionaries themselves. The first session of the high school at Lahaina was commenced July 2d, 1833. In the course of the year, there were 91 scholars in the school. Great embarrassments have been experienced by Mr. Andrews, the principal, for want of school books. The amount of printing during the year ending June, 1833, was 165,000 copies, and 9,436,000 pages. The copies of books printed from the beginning of the mission have been 776,000; pages, 33,350,360. About 365 pages of new matter were added the past year to the Sandwich Islanders' library, making the whole number of pages 1,938. About 3,000 geographies and 200 historical catechisms were bound in cloth. About one-half of the Bible has been translated, including the entire New Testament. Another printer and bookbinder will soon proceed to the aid of the mission.

At the annual meeting in 1833, extending from the 5th to the 26th of June, 19 missionaries were present. These annual convocations have been conducted with great unity of feeling and with happy results.

The number of Christian marriages at the various stations, in the year, were 143. The admissions to the churches reported were 72; candidates, 41; whole number, 659. A public fast was proclaimed by Kiana on the 3d of March, 1833, which was attended by about 2,000 persons, morning and afternoon. At several monthly concerts at Honolulu, nearly 100 dollars were contributed by the natives alone.

The three brethren who attempted a mission at the Washington islands remained there but 8 months. It was found impracticable to establish a station at which more than 1000 people could be readily reached. At the same time, several promising districts in the Sandwich islands remained unoccupied.

SAULT DE SAINT MARIE, is a station of the A. B. B. SELINGINSK; a town and military station in the government of Irkutsk, Siberia, about 160 miles south east of the city of Irkutsk, and about 4000 miles easterly from St. Petersburg, on the Selenga river. It is well acquainted for the Chinese trade carried on at Kainchina. Inhabitants about 3000, exclusive of those of several villages. E. lon. 107° 25', N. lat. 51° 16'. Selinginsk is in the centre of all the Buriats, a name given to several populous tribes of Tartars in the government of Irkutsk, who are, in general, very ignorant, even of the tenets of their own superstition; nor is it requisite, according to their ideas, that they should know them.

Their religion is suited to their indolence of mind, as well as the depravity of their natures; and they are not easily induced to change it for one which addresses the understanding and the heart.

The following practice illustrates their predominant characteristic. The Buriat procures a prayer, written on a long slip of paper, and suspends it where it will be moved by wind or passers-by, or rolls it round the fire of a small oven, which keeps his getting in motion, and suffers his conscience that it is acceptably offered to the god. These praying mills are very numerous; and they have various other modes of worship equally suited to their indolent habits. Indeed, their whole system is a delusion, and their services are unmeaning farms. Their restraints from animal indulgences are confined to the short time spent in their temples; from which they return to commit all uncleanness with freedom.

They speak the Mongolian language, but their books are in an unknown tongue. The Selinginsk Buriats are in the centre of all the Buriats on the east side of Baikal lake, and are estimated at about 15,000; they have 10 temples, and not less than 2,000 lamas or chief priests. The Chorinsk tribe are distinguished for their wealth. They are divided into 11 tribes, inhabiting the country eastward of Selinginsk, are estimated at 30,000, and have only 4 temples, and scarcely 200 lamas. Upwards of 100,000 males belong to the nation of Buriats.

The Rev. Messrs. Stallgrass, Swan, and Yuille, from the L. M. S., arrived in 1819, and this mission, first commenced at Irkutsk, has received the full approbation and aid of the Russian government.

Translation of the Scriptures. The Mongolian translation of the New Testament was completed during the year 1826. The importance of this translation of the Scriptures will be more fully appreciated, when it is considered that Mongolian is spoken and understood, not only among the Buriats, but extensively in Chinese Tartary, and in a south-westerly direction, among the inhabitants of all the intermediate country, from Selinginsk to Tibet. The Mongolians Proper are subjects of the Chinese empire, and the Kolles and Utahs, also under the same government, use the same language.

Robert Yuille now labors at Selinginsk. His labors at this station prevent his itinerating among the surrounding tribes.

SENECAS; one of the Six Nations of Indians. The remnants of the tribe reside in various villages in the western part of New York. The New York Missionary society, which was founded in 1796, established a mission among this tribe in 1811. Mr. J. B. Hyde, in the capacity first of teacher, then catechist, continued with them from 1811 to 1821. He translated several portions of the Scriptures into the Seneca language, which were printed. In 1821, the mission was transferred to the care of the Union Foreign Missionary Society. In 1826, it was transferred from that society to the A. B. C. F. M. The station is 4 or 5 miles from Buffalo. Rev. Asher Wright, missionary, and his wife, and Asenath Bishop now reside at the Seneca station. The church has been very severely tried on account of dissensions on the subject of selling the land and removing. Mr. Wright is pursuing the study of the Seneca language.

SERAMPORE, a town in the province of Bengal, Hindostan, 15 miles north of Calcutta, on the west bank of the Hoogly. E. lon. 88° 26', N. lat. 22° 45'. It signifies the town of the glorious god Ram; or the glorious town. Rain. It is a little Danish settlement, in the midst of an immense British territory. A line of good-looking houses stretches along the water; some of them had no great extent. They belong to the Danes and Europeans, whose number is very small. The population is about 20,000, nearly all Hindoos. They generally inhabit poor mud-walled or bamboo-walled cottages. The Baptist Serampore college is an admirably planned building, with a commanding front towards the Hoogly. For the early history of the Baptist mission, see CALCUTTA. The mission was commenced in 1793.

In the month of November, 1800, the missionaries were gratified in beholding the first decided convert to the faith, voluntarily breaking his caste, and boldly encountering the reproach of Christ. On this delightful occasion, Kristno, a converted native, was baptized, together with Dr. Carey's eldest son, after having, a few days before, publicly renounced caste, by eating with the missionaries. This event reworked their hearts, and gave them renewed courage in 1793. In the month of June, 1801, some of them had now for years patiently waited and prayed for this day; some had entered into their heavenly rest without the gratification of beholding it; and one of them, who hardly survived six months, was carried in an emaciated state to witness a scene so cheering to his soul, that he was almost ready to say with Simeon—'Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace; for mine eyes have seen thy salvation.' The Armenians, Feringhis, and the Sauts broke down, and the way opened for numerous accessions to the church of Christ from this people, hitherto entrenched in prejudices and superstition, and impenetrable to all the convictions of divine truth and the evidences of the gospel.

In the following year, several more renounced caste and were baptized; the New Testament was printed at the mission press; and the missionaries subsequently continued the work of translating, printing, and distributing the Scriptures and portions of them, and using various other important measures to instruct and enlighten the heathen.

Mr. Ward gives the following short but interesting account of the first attempt of a Hindoo to preach the gospel to his countrymen:—

March 6, 1803.—In the evening brother Carey gave out a hymn and read a chapter, after which, old Fetambar preached in Bengalee to a congregation of Hindoos, Mussulmans, Armenians, Feringhis, English, &c. His text was a small pamphlet of his own writing, which we printed for him. After praying a short time with fervor and consistency, he sat down, and with his hands joined together and stretched out, he craved their attention. He then spoke for an hour, with faithfulness and much propriety; and closed the whole with prayer. We were much pleased with this first attempt. He is the first of them who has become a proselyte to the Christian religion. This is another reason, for which we have reason to bless God, O that he may increase the number of faithful native laborers! This is the grand desideratum that is to move the Hindoo nation."

In 1801, the missionaries were increased to 10, besides 2 natives, and 14 were baptized. In 1805, 13 of whom were natives, were baptized; and in 1806, 21 natives.

In 1810, there were 19 ministers and 8 churches. During this year, 106 were baptized, most of whom were in Jessore. In 1812, a great calamity befel the mission, in the loss of their large printing office by fire, containing the types of all the Scriptures that had been printed to the value of at least 10,000 pounds. This was a severe dispensation of providence, not only as the greatness of the loss threatened to overwhelm their feeble affairs, but was felt most sensibly by them; it was indeed fatal, for a considerable time, and it could put a stop to the publication of the Scriptures altogether. Yet that God, who in his infinite wisdom judged it right thus to try them, appeared for them in this crisis in a most wonderful manner. They were able to recover from the fire the moulds for casting new types; the sympathy and assistance of their friends on the spot was most affectionately offered; and no sooner were the types made known in Britain, than every heart was alive to the feeling of their situation, and every hand ready to contribute towards repairing their loss. Christians of every denomination vied with each other in the most solid expressions of condolence; so that, in a comparatively short time, a sum was raised and forwarded from all parts of the kingdom, which more than covered the amount of the damage they had sustained. Several thousand dollars were contributed in the United States. The Selas then returned to the work of the publication of the translations was, however, very distressing; they had to begin much of their labor anew; and had they not found among the rubbish the steel punches of all the Indian languages, uninjured by the flames, years must have elapsed before they could have replaced the types they had lost. About 70 members were, however, added to the churches at Serampore and Calcutta; and at the close of the year, the mission embraced 12 stations, containing about 500 members.

In 1818, the missionaries purchased ground, and commenced a college; the objects of which are, to train up pious youths for the Christian ministry, to augment the biblical knowledge of such as are already employed in preaching, and to enable those who, by the loss of caste, have been reduced to indigence, to maintain themselves. In 1819, there were 37 pupils, under the presidency of Dr. Carey, who delivers theological lectures in Bengalee. In 1819-20, Mr. Ward visited England and the United States in its behalf, and obtained 25,000 dollars. The missionaries contributed 11,000 dollars from their own labors.

In 1823, the excellent and devoted Mr. Ward was removed from the toils of this world to the glories of another.

In 1827, an event occurred, which was a source of pain to many of the friends of the society. This was the withdrawal of the brethren at Serampore, and of the stations immediately connected with it, from the society at home. Some misunderstanding existed between the brethren at Serampore and the committee in England, in reference to the tenure on which the premises at the former place were held, the college, which the brethren there had erected chiefly for literary objects, and the support required by the outstations chiefly at Serampore. A long correspondence took place at different times, but the controversy is now amicably settled.

The venerable Dr. Carey has recently died, full of age and honor. The missionaries at Serampore are Dr. Marshman, John Mack, John Leechman, Joshua Rowe, W. C. Barclay, and John C. Marshman; 3 native assistants; 12 natives preparing for the mission; 3 converts; 75 female scholars; 143 Christian students in college; 37 tracts issued, 42,500.

SHAWNPEES; a tribe of Indians, among whom the A. B. F. have commenced a mission.

SHAMPURKER; a village near Calcutta, where the Calcutta Church Missionary association support a school.

SHARON; a station of the L. M. S. on the Island Barbadoes, West Indies. It was commenced in 1794. In the course of 1823, 69 adult negroes were baptized, and 52 admitted to the Lord's supper.

In 1833, at Sharon, Taylor and Close were missionaries. Congregation, 1178.

SHEPHERD'S HALL; a station of the B. M. S. in Jamaica, 16 miles from Kingston; 1044 inquirers.

SILBOH; a station of the L. M. S. on the Klippflap river, in Caffrland, South Africa, in the Pambooke tribe, commenced in 1828. Halter and Hoffman, missionaries. From June, 1830, to February, 1831, the inhabitants increased from 169 to 390. Mr. Halter states in February, 1831, that God was granting his smiles to the mission, that numbers came to hear the word of life, and that the church would not hold the crowded auditories. In worldly things also they were abundantly blessed. A large number of acres have been irrigated.

In October, 1834, there were 63 native houses in Silboh. Fritsch, Hoffman, and Bonatz, missionaries; 8 adults and 5 children baptized; 27 communicants; 320 inhabitants.

SHOBHA BAZAAR; a village in the suburbs of Calcutta, where there is a school.

SHOOTWOOD; a station of the B. M. S. in Jamaica.

SIAM; a country of Eastern Asia, separated from Pegu, on the west, by a chain of mountains, and from Laos and Cambodia, on the east, by another chain. It may be considered as a wide valley between two chains of mountains. The population is between 3,000,000 and 4,000,000. The religion is that of Buddha. Considerable success has attended the labors of Mr. Gutzlaff, formerly of the N. M. S., and of Mr. Tomlin, of the L. M. S., in Siam. (See BANKOK.) An English and Siamese dictionary has been prepared, and the whole New Testament translated. The L. M. S. and the A. B. C. F. M. are about to commence regular missions in this country. It is of great importance on account of its relations to China. Mr. Abel, of the A. B. C. F. M., in the course of the last year, made an interesting survey of some portions of this country.

For further particulars in regard to the mission in Siam, see BANKOK. SIBERIA; a country of Northern Asia, belonging to Russia, bounded on the north by the Frozen ocean, on the west by the Uralian mountains, which separate it from Europe, on the south-west by Irdependant Tartary, on the south by China, on the east by the ocean, and Eyring's straits. Its length is about 4000 miles, and its breadth varies from 1100 to 1900. Its surface is about 6,900,000 of square miles. Russia derives three great advantages from Siberia—protection to her European provinces from any attack on that side, millions of clear profits from the mines, and a commercial trade with China and America. The Siberian trade is enjoyed as a monopoly by the Russian merchants. The L. M. S. have established missions in Siberia. (See SILINGINAK, KROON, and ONAL.) Rev. William Swan, one of the missionaries, in a speech before the L. M. S. at its anniversary in May, 1834, has the following remarks.

Progress of idolatry in 100 years. Had this missionary institution existed 100 years ago, and had missionaries gone to those parts of the world, they would have found the land overrun with that form of superstition which has existed there for many centuries, but there would not have been found one priest, properly so called, and not one heathen temple desecrating the ground. But when we went thither 11 years ago, we found nearly 20 heathen temples rearing their heads amid the snows of Siberia, and to these temples were attached 4000 priests of the Buddhist superstition. The simple fact is this, that within the last century, if Christians have in some parts been making the greatest efforts to propagate the truths of the gospel, the powers of darkness have not been dormant. Their cause has been making progress eastward and westward; and during the period that I have now mentioned, its progress has been such, that those very parts where missions have been established; and perhaps it cannot yet be said to be on the retrograde. But what we have been engaged in, we trust, has at least a tendency, and we trust will soon have the effect of turning the tide; and instead of idolatry spreading there, the light of truth will roll southward and westward, to China, that grand source of idolatry. The Scriptures have been translated into the language of the Mongolian tribes, a language spoken by many of the tribes to whom we first access, and spoken within the boundaries of the Chinese empire by millions. It is spoken and read (for the books in that language are numerous) from the shores of the Baltic to the gates of Peking."

SIBERRA LEONE; a British colony of recaptured negroes in the country of the same name in West Africa. For the following account of the early history of the colony, we are indebted to the North American Review.

"In consequence of the memorable decision of the English judiciary in the case of Somerset, that slavery could not exist upon the soil of England, several hundred blacks, unaccustomed to the profitable employments of a great city, were thrown upon their own resources in the streets of London. The celebrated Granville Sharp having taken a peculiarly prominent part in the whole affair of the slave question, they looked to him as their patron; and he, after much reflection, determined to colonize them in Africa. The government, anxious to remove a class of people which it regarded as the best worthles, finally assumed the whole expense of the expedition. Under such auspices, four hundred negroes and sixty Europeans, supplied with provisions for six or eight months, sailed on the 8th of April, 1787. The result was unfortunate and even discouraging. The crowded condition of the transports, the unfavorable season at which they arrived on the coast, and the impetuosity and imprudence of the emigrants, brought on a mortality which reduced their numbers nearly one-half during the first year. Others deserted soon after landing, until forty individuals only remained.

In 1788, Mr. Sharp sent out thirty-nine more; and then a number of the deserters returned, and the settlement gradually gained strength. But, during the next year, a controversy with a neighboring native chief ended in wholly dispersing the colony; and some time elapsed before the remnants could be again collected. A charter of incorporation was obtained in 1791. Not long afterwards, about twelve hundred new emigrants were introduced from Nova Scotia, being originally refugees from this country, who had placed themselves under British protection. Still, affairs were very badly managed. One-tenth of the Nova Scotians and half of the Europeans died during one season, as much from want of provisions as any other cause. Two years afterwards, a storm of violence broke upon the company, which had been made the receptacle for African produce, was lost by fire, with a cargo valued at fifteen thousand pounds. Then, insurrections arose among the blacks. Worst of all, in 1794, a large French squadron, wholly without provocation, attacked the settlement, and although the colors were immediately struck, proceeded to an indiscriminate pillage. The books of the company were scattered and defaced; the printing-presses and scientific apparatus were destroyed; the principal officers were banished; the company's office demolished; and the buildings generally consigned to the flames. The pecuniary loss was more than fifty thousand pounds. But the directors, instead of being disheartened by these disasters, served themselves to more resolute efforts than before. They were liberally supported by the government, and the united labors of both were so effectual, that in the year 1798, Freetown, the principal village in the colony, had four hundred houses, a market town, sufficiently fortified, and accommodating twelve hundred inhabitants.

Two years afterwards, a large number of the worst part of the settlers, chiefly the Nova Scotians, rebelled against the colonial government. The governor called in the assistance of the neighboring African tribes, and matters were on the eve of a battle, when a transport arrived in the harbor, bringing five hundred and fifty Maroons from Jamaica. Lots of powder were given to these men; they proved regular and industrious; and the insurgents laid down their arms. Wars next entered with the natives, which were not finally concluded until 1807. On the first of January, 1808, all the rights and possessions of the company were surrendered to the British crown, and in this situation they have ever since remained. Of the results effected by the establishment in reference to the slave-trade on the coast, and the civilization of the interior tribes, as also of its political and commercial value to the English government and people, we may perhaps have occasion to speak hereafter. The population in 1823 was eighteen thousand, two-thirds of this number being liberated Africans. In 1825, the latter class had increased to more than fifteen thousand, exclusive of nearly one-third as many more who were resident at the timber factories and other places. To the 15th of January, four thousand and six hundred captives were added to the colony during the year 1827 alone.

Since 1816, the W. A. S. and the C. M. S. have labored successfully in this colony.

Nothing of much interest has lately occurred at this mission.

SILMIAH; a village near Calcutta, where there is a school.

SINGAPORE; a town on a small island of the same name. E. lon. 104° N. lat. 1° 24'. Since the British took possession of it 1819, it has rapidly increased in population and importance. The L. M. S. commenced a mission here in 1819.

Inhabitants of Singapore in January, 1830, were 15,181 males and 5797 females. Claudius H. Thomsen is now missionary of the L. M. S. Mr. Tomlin's connexion with the society has been dissolved on account of ill health. The A. B. C. F. M. intend to make Singapore the headquarters of their missions in the Archipelago. Its Tracy, missionary, is now established there. A printing establishment, containing 2 presses, 1 font of Roman type, 2 of Malay, 1 of Arabic, 2 of Javanese, 1 of Siamese, and 1 of Bugie, with apparatus for casting types for all these languages, and for book-binding, has been purchased. In 3 or 4 months of 1833, 140 native castles arrived from as many as 40 ports.

SIOUX HILLS; a station of the B. M. S. in the island of Jamaica. SIOUX; Indians on the Upper Mississippi, among whom T. D. Williamson, M. D., and J. Stevens, missionary, with their wives, and A. Huggens, farmer, wife, Sarah Poage and Lucy Stevens, assistants, of the A. B. C. F. M., were in 1834 trying to commence a mission.

SMYRNA; a town on the western coast of Asia, in the province of ancient Lydia. It was extolled by the ancients, under the title of "the crown of the world," from the ornaments of its island. It has been ten times destroyed by conflagrations and earthquakes, and as often has risen from its ruins. Its central situation, and the excellence of its port, attract a concourse of merchants of all nations by sea, and in caravans by land. It is the great emporium of the Levant. Population has been stated at 120,000, though frequently visited by the plague and other severe calamities. Missions of various societies have for a number of years resided temporarily at Smyrna.

"In July, 1831, there were seventeen schools in Smyrna and the neighboring places: upward of 1500 children are enumerated, but those of some of the country schools had not been ascertained. Three of the schools are under the Rev. Josiah Brewer, with Mrs. Brewer, from the New Haven Ladies' Greek committee. In addition to their own schools, monthly meetings are held at Smyrna. One school has been opened, containing from 40 to 50 girls, each of whom pay three pence monthly, or a little more than two dollars yearly.

To these has been added an English school of upward of 40 Protestant youths, which contributes to the support of the mission. The improvement of the girls in the day school has been such as to lead the Greeks to establish free schools for girls at the expense of the community. 'There is a great and increasing zeal,' Mr. Brewer writes, in March, 'among the people themselves in the cause of education. They have it in contemplation to open four or five others in different parts of the city, and one or more for girls. They have also purchased a press, and ordered a font of type from Paris. If increase of piety keeps pace with the increase of knowledge, soon should we see the days of primitive prosperity return to this least offending of the seven Apocalyptic churches.' He adds: 'In the midst of all our labors we have to lament that we have not, as yet, witnessed numerous manifestations of the converting grace of God. The children are, indeed, becoming exceedingly dear to us; and the 200 Greek and 50 Protestant youths who have been under our instruction the year past, have acquired much knowledge of God and of their duty.'

Mr. Jetter thus speaks in his journal of Mr. Brewer's schools, and of his own prospects.

"May 18, 1831.—We saw Mr. Brewer's female schools; for we expected to stay only a few days, and therefore wished to see all we could on the first day. In one of these schools we found about 120 children, who are instructed in reading, writing, and arithmetic. The same day we saw the male schools, which have been established, they are in a very good order. Several classes read the gospels, and the rest the catechism, &c. The second of these schools numbers perhaps 60 children who are of a higher class, and pay from three to four piastres (about three or four shillings) per month towards their education. We saw, further, two large Greek schools for boys, which are in the hands of the Greeks themselves, but which have hitherto been very well less successful, than those by Mr. Brewer. One of these schools is of a higher order, and is under English protection. Here the children learn different languages, and have also begun English with Mr. Brewer; who, in consequence of his many engagements, has been obliged to give it up; and they are looking out for some other person. This school counts 200 or more children, in different departments. The head master is a Mr. Abraham, from Cesarea. The former school, the former master of which I have heard, liberal. For want of time we could not hear the children read at this place. We then saw an Armenian school, on a large scale, and built in a very superior manner; but were not able to understand the children, who speak only Turkish. Two boys I saw who knew a little Greek, and have also begun to learn English: they visit Mr. Brewer twice or three times a week, and seem to be very amiable scholars."

By a subsequent letter from Mr. Jetter, dated Boujah, near Smyrna, July 19, 1831, we observe the eager desire which is manifested in Asia Minor for the blessings of education. In quoting the following extract, we can only add, that it is not in the power of the Church Missionary Society to enter at once upon plans of education so widely extending; but while the pain of each delay is necessarily augmented to it, may be hoped that the more limited ones, actually commenced, will give greater maturity; and thus furnish models, according to which the natives may be enabled to construct their own schools and seminaries.

From Smyrna, under date of August 19th, 1831, Mr. Jetter thus writes concerning his employments and prospects in that city and neighborhood:—

"We arrived here in the middle of June last, just when the plague was raging in Smyrna, and throughout Asia Minor. I took a house for the summer at Boujah, where all the English families generally reside in the hot season. For a month and a half we were almost shut up on account of the plague and had only intercourse with our few Christian friends. Divine service has, however, been performed every Sunday, with few exceptions. This agreeable duty fell on me, as both Mr. Lewis, and Mr. Arncliffe, the British chaplain, were absent. There are few here that love the Lord sincerely, but plenty, in fact, who get into the service of the church. After the plague rumor had a little subsided, we opened a girls' school at Boujah, which numbers between 60 and 70 children. The Rev. J. Brewer gave me a girl from one of his schools here, who acts at present as mistress. She lives with us; and, in her leisure hours, pursues her studies in Greek; and, lately, I have commenced English with her and a few others. We have great difficulty to obtain suitable persons for mistresses. There is another village where they want a girls' school; but I can scarcely enter upon it just now, for want of a mistress. There is a boys' school at Boujah paid for by the people, which is also, in some degree, under my influence. I have the liberty to examine the children, and to give them books. I introduced, some weeks ago, 'The Life and Character of David,' sent to us by Mr. Bremer. Select books are much sought for by the Greeks."

SOCIETY ISLANDS; a cluster of islands in the Pacific ocean, between 151° and 152° 30' W. lon. and 16° and 17° S. lat. (See HAVANINE ISLANDS, BERGARA, &c.)

SOORY; a station of the B. M. S. in Bengal, 120 miles from Calcutta, 45 north-west of Cutwa, and 50 south-west of Moorshedabad. A Joseph Williamson, missionary, with 2 native assistants. There is a gradual increase of knowledge, and diminution of prejudice.

SPRING TOWN; a station of the B. M. S. on the island Jamaica. J. M. Phillips, and John Andrews, missionaries.

SPRING GARDENS; a village in the island Antigua, where the U. B. have a church.

ST. ANNS BAY; a station of the B. M. S. on the island Jamaica. Samuel Nichols, missionary.

ST. CROIX; a small island belonging to the Little Antilles, West Indies. The port St. Croix is 17° 34' N. lat. and 64° 45' W. lon. In 1733, it was sold by the crown of France to the Danish West India company. An ineffectual attempt was made in 1734, by the U. B., to establish a mission in this island. In 1740, another attempt was made, but the unhealthiness of the climate compelled the missionaries to abandon the island. A permanent establishment was effected in 1753, by George Onizberg, and two other brethren, who were joyfully received by the Christian negroes; but both they and the slaves in their neighborhood were, for some time, kept in a state of constant alarm by the wicked attempts which were made to burn their houses. Onizberg was, however, inflexibly determined to remain, and the persecution soon ceased. An estate of 4 acres was purchased, which was named Friedenthal. The number of persons who attended the preaching of the gospel rapidly increased, and more than 100 negroes were annually received into the church by the rite of baptism. In 1771, another settlement was formed and named Friedensberg. In 1772, a dreadful hurricane swept over the island. This was followed by a famine, and an epidemic sickness. But the negroes appeared more and more anxious to be saved. The auxiliary societies consisted of more than 1000 persons, and many were, every month, admitted to the privileges of Christian baptism. In 1783, a third station was formed, and called Friedensfeld. In 1801, St. Croix was delivered to the British authority, but it has since been restored. In the beginning of 1829, Mr. Van Scholten, the governor general of the Danish West India islands, after attending divine service in one of the churches, made the following inquiries concerning the mission in St. Croix. "On being informed that the number of negroes under the care of the U. B. amounted to 6000, he declared, in presence of his attendants, that he considered it would be for the benefit of the colony, if a much larger proportion of its population (amounting to 21,000) was in connexion with the church; promising, at the same time, to promote the cause of the mission by every means in his power."

ST. EUSTATIUS; or ST. EUSTATIA; an island belonging to the Little Antilles, West Indies, N. lat. 17° 29', W. lon. 63° 55'. It is about 2 leagues in length and 1 in breadth; it consists of two mountains, and a deep valley between them. It has been stated that the population amounts to 4000 whites and 14,000 negroes. It belongs to the Dutch. It is 8 miles north-west of St. Christopher. It has been subject to several violent changes. The principal production is tobacco. The W. I. S. have a mission on the island.

ST. JAN; the third and smallest of the Danish West Indies. The W. I. S. established a mission on this island in 1741, through some of the converts from St. Thomas had visited it previously. An estate was purchased and called Berthany, and in 1754, John Ercker took up his residence on the island, and began to proclaim salvation to the poor negroes. In a few years, the number of converts was, perhaps, greater, in proportion to the population, than in any other mission in the world. In 1782, another settlement was formed and named Ennaus. A vast destructive hurricane ravaged this island in 1793, which destroyed the mission church at Berthany. In 1813, the number of baptized persons was 1361, and of communicants, 677. In 1828, it was stated that the mission was flourishing, and that there was much "divine life" in the island.

ST. JOHN'S; a station of the U. B. in the town of the same name in Antigua. It was commenced in 1774. In 1763, 60 adults were received into the church in one day. In 1823, it appeared, that there had been baptized and received into the congregation in that town, 16,041 negroes; in the following year, 468 more were baptized. In 1825, at one time, 48 persons for the first time were admitted to the sacrament of the supper.

ST. JARVIS'S; one of the Little Antilles, West Indies. Lat. 15° 4' N., lon. 63° 6' W. One-half this island belongs to the French, the other to the Dutch. Many of the settlers are of English origin. The coast is indented with bays, which makes it appear larger than it really is. The interior is mountainous. The annual profits of a single salt marsh amount to 12,000 pounds. The W. I. S. have a mission on this island.

ST. THOMAS, and ST. VINCENT. (See THOMAS, St., and VINCENT, St.)

STEINKOPFF; visited as an outstation from Komagaze, on the frontier of Little Namaqualand, South Africa, within the colony, about 22 days' journey from the cape.

Inhabitants of Steinkopff in 1833, 260. Scholars, 20 to 100. Daily morning and evening services are well attended.

STEYNBOECH; a station of the Rhenish Missionary society, South Africa. Luckhoff, Gerard, Terlinck, missionaries. Schools flourishing.

STEWART'S TOWN; a station of the B. M. S. in Jamaica, 18 miles from Kingston; 58 communicants; 716 inquirers.

SULKEA; an outstation from Calcutta, where Mr. Thomas preaches the gospel and extensively distributes tracts.

SURAT; a city of Hindostan, in Gojjerat, with a strong citadel situated on the left bank of the Tappie, about 20 miles from its mouth. It is one of the most ancient cities of Hindostan; the outer wall is 7 miles in circuit, with 12 gates, and irregular towers between each. The streets are dirty, narrow, and irregular; the houses generally lofty; and the inhabitants estimated at 300,000. The public buildings are few and mean, and the nobles' palace is contemptible. The mosques and tombs are small, and the Hindoo edifices equally insignificant. A great portion of the trade of Surat has been transferred to Bombay, but yet it is considerable. It is the emporium of the most precious productions of Hindostan; for hither are brought from the interior an immense quantity of goods, which the merchants export to the Red sea, the Persian gulf, the coasts of Malabar, the Comorin, and even to China. There are many Mahomedans, Gentoos, Jews, and Christians of various sects as they are in Arabia, or in other Turkish countries, nor are the distinctions of tribes among the Hindoos who reside here strictly observed. The Hindoos are almost all of the caste of the brahmins; and their skill and dexterity in matters of calculation and economy often raise them to places of considerable trust. The country about Surat is fertile, except toward the sea, where it is sandy and barren. Before the English East India company obtained possession of Ennahay, the presidency of the affairs on the coast of Malabar was at Surat; and they had a factory here, after the presidency was transferred to Bombay. In 1800, a treaty was concluded with the nabob of Surat, by which the management of the city and district was vested in the British. By a treaty in 1803, the Mahabats were compelled to abandon all their various claims on this city, and the British authority in this place became supreme. Surat is 158 miles north of Bombay. E. lon. 73° 2' N. lat. 21° 12'.

C. C. Aratoon, a converted Armenian, connected with the B. M. S., proceeded to this city in 1812, and labored in it and the adjoining country for about 9 years, preaching and distributing tracts and editions of the Scriptures in several languages. The afterwards removal to Calcutta. The Rev. Messrs. Skinner and W. Fyvie, of the L. M. S., commenced a mission here in 1815, and were usefully employed among the soldiers and natives in the city and neighboring villages, and in translating the Scriptures into Gojurrat. Mr. Skinner died October 29, 1821, the same day on which Mr. A. Fyvie sailed from Gravesend to join the mission.

William Fyvie is now missionary at Surat. A. Fyvie and Mr. Salmon, on account of ill health, have been compelled to return to England. Four boys' and 1 girls' school. Eight thousand five hundred copies of various parts of the Bible have been printed during the year. Two Goozerates and 1 English service are held on the Sabbath.

GUIANA. A Dutch settlement in Guiana, South America, frequently called Dutch Guiana. It is watered by the river Surinam. Paramaribo, the capital, is a pleasant town. If we include the military establishments, the number of Europeans or whites in Surinam may amount to 10,000; the greater part of them reside in the capital. The number of Africans is about 80,000. The value of the exports is calculated at 1,000,000 pounds. "Those that have visited Holland," says Matthe Brun, "and Lower Hottelstein, may form an imperfect notion of the Dutch and British settlements in Guiana; a vast plain covered with plantations, or enlamed with the rich verdure, bounded on one side by a dark ridge of impenetrable forests, and watered on the other by the azure billows of the ocean." Before the year 1776, Christopher Kersten, a Moravian, and a few of his friends, who were engaged in business in Paramaribo, embraced every opportunity of communicating instruction to the negroes, whom they hired as journey-men. In 1776, several individuals were baptized, and on the subsequent arrival of two assistant missionaries, a church was erected. At the close of the year 1778 the congregation consisted of more than 100 persons. During the war which occurred between Great Britain and Holland in the latter part of the last century, the missionaries at Paramaribo were placed in a very precarious situation. The arms of the Netherlands in North America, was suspended for many months. In 1800, 315 baptized negroes belonged to their congregation, besides a considerable number of catechumens. On the 4th of July, 1827, 50 years had elapsed since the first fruits of the brethren's labors in Paramaribo. The day was observed with much solemnity by a large congregation. In this time, the brethren had baptized 2,477 persons. (See PARAMARIBO.)

SYRIA: an island in the Grecian Archipelago, one of the Cyclades. It is moist and cold, but fertile in grain. The following account of the rise of the proceedings of the C. M. S. at Syria will be read with interest.

"Dr. Korck first visited Syria in the beginning of 1823. A school had just been established there by the Rev. Josiah Brewer, a missionary from the American Board of Commissioners of Foreign Missions." Of this school Dr. Korck took charge; and with the sanction of count Capo d'Istria, the president of the new Greek state, considerably enlarged it. In August, 1823, the number of scholars amounted to 230, including 80 girls. At the close of 1820, the number had risen to 520, of which 170 were girls.

Mr. Hilder returned to Syria, after a visit in England, in December, 1833. He has been settled for 5 years in that island, and has repeatedly received the warmest testimonies of approbation from those best able to judge. He was at one time seriously interrupted by the machinations of some Roman Catholics. Two schools of mutual instruction contain 220 scholars; 140 infants under instruction. In June, 1833, all the scholars were 450; besides, 339 scholars in government schools were under his care. There were five private schools of 263 scholars, and 5 ancient Greek with 218 scholars.

SYRIA: a country of Western Asia, bounded on the north-east by the Euphrates, north by mount Amanus, west by the Mediterranean, east by the deserts. It presents a very mixed population. The original inhabitants, amalgamated with the Greeks, form a very small portion of the whole. All civil and military employments are in the hands of the Turks. Many Arabs are settled as cultivators. There are likewise many Bedouins or wandering Arabs, especially in the pashalik of Damascus. In that of Aleppo, there are hordes of Turcomans and Koords. For the following description of the different classes of the inhabitants, we are indebted to the American Quarterly Register for August, 1829.

"Jews. Rabbinists, attached to human traditions and commentaries. Karaites, adhere to the simple text of the Old Testament. Samaritans, ground their faith on the Pentateuch alone.

"CHRISTIANS. Greek Oriental church, believe in the first seven general councils, together with the Bible. Armenians are Monophysites, or believers in the doctrine that Christ had but one nature, and that the Holy Spirit proceeded from the Father only, yet with such modifications as to consist, perhaps, with orthodoxy. Syrians, also Monophysites, but have no communion with the Armenians. Cepts and Abyssinians, hold to a Christianity corrupted by Judaism and Mohammedanism. Maronites, a sect of Roman Catholics, so called from the abbe Maron. They reside in the neighborhood of mount Lebanon. Frank Roman Catholics, a secession from the Greek church in 1717. Armenian Roman Catholics, a secession from the Armenian church. Syrian Roman Catholics. Their patriarch is Mar Gregorius. Frank Roman Catholics, European consuls, residents, &c. Protestants, English consuls, travellers, missionaries, &c.

"MOHAMMEDANS. Summites, or the party who believe in the Sonna, or dreams of Mohammed. Schites, who reject them. The greatest divisions are, Shiites, who believe in the first believe in, and the last deny the legitimacy of the first three caliphs.

"DARSES. Their origin is unknown. They call themselves Unitarians, worship the caliph of Egypt, &c.

"ANSARI. Mixed sect, believe in transmigration, several incarnations of the Deity, &c.

"ISHMELITES. Very small sect, reside between Aleppo and Antioch. "Yakobsites." Chameleons sect, Jews, Mohammedans, Christians, as suits convenience.

"The Rev. William Jowett, from whose Researches the preceding abstract has been compiled, says that the deplorable state of things in Syria is perpetuated by the following circumstances: 1. Religious opinions are for the most part interwoven with political feelings and external habits. 2. Each of the religions has a subdivision turning upon a most essential particular. 3. The cause and the effect of the unvarying ignorance which prevails, is the system of distinctions between the priesthood and laity. Thus it is the interest of a few professed teachers to hold the rest of their fellow-men in darkness.

"The Rev. Isaac Bird, after several years' attentive observation, says, 'that with the exception of those who have been benefited by missionary instruction, he has never found one individual in Syria, who appeared even ashamed to lie, and to profane the name and Sabbaths of the Most High.'

TABOR MOUNT; a station of the U. B. in Barbadoes.

Zippel is missionary at Tabor. Congregation, 193.

TAHAA: one of the Society Islands, where Mr. Smith, of the L. M. S., has been sent; and, as it is supposed, has reached there.

TAHITI; the principal of the Georgia Islands, supposed to have been discovered about the end of the eighteenth century by Quiros. Captain Cook visited it in 1770, and designated the estuary of which Tahiti is the principal, Georgian islands, in honor of George III. They are situated in the southern tropic, between the 5th and 7th degrees of latitude. Lon. 119°. The circumference of Tahiti is 103 miles. It is formed by two peninsulas. The population is about 10,000. Since 1810 it has been rapidly increasing.

On the 10th of August, 1796, 23 missionaries embarked from London for it, and the neighbouring islands. March 6, 1797, 18 landed at Tahiti; 10 at Tongataboo, in the following month; the other at St. Christina, in the succeeding June. A number of most auspicious circumstances attended this commencement; and the report of captain Wilson, upon the return of the ship Duff, related the friends of the mission beyond measure. Something like triumph was expressed over the cool and calculating minds of these people for the first efforts of the society. But the triumph was soon turned into lamentation. Successive reports of disastrous and discouraging events tried the patience and resolution of the society to the uttermost. The capture, by the French, of the Duff, in her second voyage to the South seas, with 10 married and 15 single missionaries—the report of the departure of 11 of the number that were at Tahiti for Port Jackson, on account of the ill-treatment of the natives by the natives—the murder of one of them at New South Wales, the murder of 3 others at Tongataboo, and the departure of the remainder for Port Jackson, and, with one exception, their subsequent arrival in England, almost overwhelmed the society, and for a season threatened to quench the missionary zeal of the religious public. The persons who at first had objected to the mission, pitied the weakness and censured the imprudence of those who projected it. The cause of the South Sea Islanders, however, was not relinquished. The directors encouraged the 7 missionaries remaining at Tahiti to continue, urged those that were at Port Jackson to return, and sent out 12 more missionaries in the Royal Admiral, commanded by captain William Wilson. The missionaries at Port Jackson returned to Tahiti; and, with those previously there, endeavored to persevere to accomplish the work for which they were sent; and some circumstances arose which encouraged their hopes, till in 1810, when, owing to the wars among the natives, all the missionaries, except Messrs. Nott and Hayward, left the islands, and sought refuge at Port Jackson, 13 years after first reaching Tahiti. This news again greatly humbled and afflicted the society; and their hopes of final success were almost extinguished. Patience and perseverance were thought to be presumption and enthusiasm. It was triumphantly said, the folly of attempting to evangelize a people before they are civilized is no longer a subject of reasoning; it is now decided by experiment. More than once it was proposed, in the direction, to recall all the missionaries from the South seas. It was, however, a time of great anxiety and much prayer. The majority prevailed in favor of presenting an urgent request to the missionaries at New South Wales, that when more auspicious circumstances should arise in the islands, they would return to them, and make another effort in the strength of the Lord. Happily for the society, the cause, and the welfare of the islanders, the missionaries did return; and now, the sun of prosperity brightened upon them. The set time for the mission came. Several of the missionaries had become quite masters of the language, and the saving power of the Spirit accompanied their preaching. The king, a principal chief, and a priest of the first order, were converted to Christ. Some of the natives held, by their own appointment, meetings for prayer. At the close of 1814, 50 on this island and Eimeo had renounced their idols, and wished to be considered worshippers of Jehovah, and more than 200, principally adults, attended the schools.

About this time, not less than 50, in all the islands, had determined to turn from their lying vanities to the living God. In 1815, the worship of idols was abolished.

On the 21st of September, 1821, the deputation of the L. M. S., Rev. D. Tyerman and George Bennett, Esq., arrived safely at Tahiti, and on the 10th of December they wrote from Eimeo to the following effect—

"We are in health and comfort up to the present moment, and have been more delighted with the victories and blessed results of preaching and living the gospel of Christ than we are able to express, at every station where we have already been in Tahiti, and in this island, (Eimeo.) 'TRULY, THE HALF WAS NOT TOLD US.' God has indeed done great things here, in a civil, moral, and religious view. The people here exhibit as literal and pleasing a proof of being 'turned from darkness into light, and from the power of Satan unto God,' as can be conceived.

"A nation of pillerers has become eminently trustworthy. A people formerly universally addicted to licentiousness, in all its forms, have become modest and virtuous in the highest degree: those who, a few years ago, despised all forms of religion, except their own horrid and cruel superstitions, have uniformly declared their approbation of Christianity, study diligently those parts of the Christian Scriptures which have been translated for them, ask earnestly for more, and appear conscientiously to regulate themselves by the sacred oracles, under the direction of their kind teachers, whose self-denying zeal and perseverance have been almost as remarkable as the success with which God has been pleased to honor them.

"You have learned, we trust, from letters sent home before we reached Tahiti, that the translations and printing are going on well. Matthew and John are printed in the Tahitian language, and are in innumerable hands; the book of Genesis, Joshua, the Psalms, Isaiah, the Acts, the epistles to the Romans, and the other epistles, are in course of translation, and are waiting the mutual corrections of the brethren. The grammar and dictionary are not in so forward a state; but both these are so important, that we hope to make a more encouraging report of their progress at no distant period.

"We are gratified in observing, almost every where, many marks of improvement; better houses and chapels being built, or in preparation; reading and writing; European dresses partially superseding the Tahitian; the chiefs ingeniously and diligently building their own boats in the European form, with European tools; many cultivating tobacco and sugar, and nearly all manufacturing cocoa-nut oil.

"Among other marks of improvement, we must mention a road which is already made to a considerable extent, and which is intended to route the whole island. This is of very great and obvious importance. It has been formed by persons who were punished, according to the new laws, for evil doing; and the intention is, that it should be completed by persons of that description. It is remarkable that these persons have no need to be superintended in their labor, but they uniformly perform the portion of work allotted to them. Before this, there was no road in any part of the island, except the narrow winding tracks by which the natives found their way from one place to another."

"The king's illness continued to increase rapidly; and on the 7th of December, Mr. Cook was requested by a messenger to attend immediately, as Pomare had fainted. He accordingly hastened to the royal residence, with Mr. Redfern, a surgeon from Port Jackson, and found that his patient's end was fast approaching. After he had revived, Mr. Cook reminded him, that though he was a great sinner, the Lord Jesus was a great Savior, and he alone could aid him in the article of death. The dying monarch replied, emphatically, Jesus alone! and then sank into a kind of stupor, which continued till about eight o'clock, when his spirit was summoned to the unseen world.

"This station was afterwards named Tough Town. Mr. Hayward was compelled, by Mrs. Hayward's state of health, to return to New South Wales, where he is usefully employed; and his devoted coadjutor, Mr. Nutt, after a diligent and faithful service in the islands of nearly 30 years, visited his native country.

"We copy the following general remarks of the committee of the L. M. S. respecting the missions in the South sea. Particular notices in regard to Tahiti are given under the various stations on that island. (See WATCH TOWN, GAYFAX TOWN, HAWAII TOWN, &c.)

"The stations in this part of the world have been again assailed by the injurious misrepresentations of unfriendly visitors; but the nature of their hostility has shown more distinctly the salutary influence of the missions, and the extent and importance of the advantages which they have conferred. The difference between those among the natives who profess religion from experience of its power and deliberate attachment to its principles, and those who are influenced by inferior motives, becomes every year more strongly marked; and though the tares and the wheat both grow together, the one is not so likely to be mistaken for the other, as during the periods immediately following the general profession of Christianity.

"The order and harmony existing among the members of the several churches, their attachment to the Scriptures, the additions which have been made to their number, the unwavering faith and unclouded hope of several who have departed this life during the past year, and the grateful and decisive testimony which some, who had for a series of years adored the religion of the Son of God, when approaching the eternal world, had borne to its blessedness and power, cannot fail to excite renewed thanksgiving unto him, who manifested to deliver from the fear of death, and hath brought life and immortality to light, by his gospel."

"The return of several who had deviated from Christian purity, or had been seduced from the simplicity of Christian doctrine by visionary heresies, and the penitence and Christian deportment of many who were formerly distinguished principally by their wickedness, are sources of encouragement; though some still resemble the latter, whose rank and station cause their apostasy to be deeply deplored.

"The general attention to education, the proficiency of the natives at some of the stations in the mechanic arts, their maritime enterprise, the increase of cultivation, accumulating sources of comfort, and the possession of cattle by a number of the chiefs and people, indicate an advancement in intelligence, industry, and happiness. Their improvement is less, indeed, than those who are accustomed to form their anticipations from the progress of a civilized and enlightened or organized community; but yet such as to prove that the native habits of inherent and almost inveterate indolence are yielding to those motives to industry which were being implanted by Christianity, and strengthened by each advance in civilization. Their infant manufactures—their cultivation of the sugar-cane and other valuable productions—the extent of the villages, and the increasing number of ships which they furnish with refreshments, are evidences of their external prosperity.

"Deeply convinced of the injury sustained by some of the missionary stations, from the visits of unprincipled or profligate mariners from professedly Christian countries, and of the salutary influence of the institutions established by benevolent and pious individuals in several British ports, as well as in the metropolis, and also in the United States of America and other parts of the world, for promoting the religious improvement of seamen; and while they rejoice that the members or agents of such societies are often enabled to place on board outward-bound vessels, persons whose conversation and example are not less beneficial to those who sail with them than to the inhabitants of the countries which they visit, it would afford them still greater pleasure if, by means of such societies, chaplains were to be placed in the different foreign ports to which British seamen resort, for the purpose of attending to their moral and religious instruction. Their necessities in this respect the missionaries at the stations visited by shipping have always endeavored to supply, so far as the claims of the people around them would admit; and accounts of very pleasing instances of the benevolent result of their exertions in the South Sea islands have been communicated during the past year."

Great evils continue to exist at Tahiti, and most of the islands in the South sea where missions have been established, in consequence of the introduction of rum, by British and American ships. Vigorous measures have been taken by the L. M. S., the British and Foreign Temperance society, and the American Temperance society, to put a stop to the sale of rum. A large number of temperance publications have been sent out to the islands.

TANANARIVO; the station of the L. M. S. in Madagascar. It is the capital of the island, and the residence of the royal family, 200 miles S. W. from Tamatave, a port on the eastern side of the island.

TANJORE; a district of Southern India, in point of fertility and soil the most fertile in Hindostan, Burdwan in Bengal being the first. On the N. E. the Southern Arcet, on the E. the Danish settlement of Tranquebar, and on the W. Trichinopoly. The river Cavery flows through the province. The inhabitants are uncommonly expert in husbandry. In 1807, they amounted to 171,648. The territory was transferred to the British jurisdiction in 1799. Tanjore, the capital, E. lon. 79° 10' N. lat. 10° 46', is an ancient city, and in remote ages was the seat of great learning. Under the Christian Knowledge society, Mr. Schwartz labored for a great number of years in this region, with extraordinary success. He reckoned that 2,000 persons had been converted by his means.

Bishop Heber arrived at Tanjore on the 25th of March, 1826; and it was there, in the institutions of the venerable Schwartz, in the labors of the excellent men who have since followed him on the same field, and in the numerous churches of native Christians which they have founded and built up, that his interest was most powerfully excited, and the energies of his mind most earnestly employed. The morning after his arrival, (Easter-day,) his lordship preached in the mission church in the fort, and administered the Lord's supper to 53 native Christians, using (as was his constant custom in all native congregations) the words of administration in their own language. In the evening he attended the Tamil service in the same church; the liturgy being read by the missionaries present, and the sermon preached by Dr. Cameron, of Tranquebar; and he himself pronouncing the benediction in Tamil. "Gladly," he exclaimed to me, "says the Rev. T. Robinson, "while taking off his robes, 'gladly would I purchase this day with years* of existence.'" On the following morning (Easter Monday) he confirmed 12 descendants of Europeans, and administered the sacrament in the evening of the same day he attended divine service in Tamil, at the small chapel in the mission garden. After the sermon, his lordship, from his seat at the altar, addressed the missionaries who were present, and the native teachers by whom they were attended. He exhorted them to fidelity, diligence, and increasing zeal, patience in bearing privations and neglect for Christ's sake, looking to him for their help and their reward, and most prayers for him, for their peace of rest, who had shown such kindness to the church of Christ. He alluded beautifully to the grave of Schwartz, over which they were then standing, and charged them to follow his bright example. The effect produced on the minds of all present was such as I never witnessed; it will never be obliterated."

The importance of this station will be fully apparent from another quotation from the same pen—

"I commend the Tanjore mission, with all its important labors, to the patronage and support—I will venture to say more—to the affectionate regard, of the committee. Most richly do they deserve all the nurture, all the assistance, all the kindness, that can be shown them. The wisdom of all the institutions of the venerable Schwartz (whose name is yet as fresh in every town and village as in my memory) is held in such respect and holy veneration as we are accustomed to render to apostles only) is visible to all who visit that most interesting country, and leaves no doubt on the mind, that the best and wisest method of sending the kingdom of Christ to this country, is to strengthen these existing establishments. They have in them a principle of unlimited self-extension; and if in the last 20 years, with little aid and great discouragement, the labors of those venerable men who have trod in the steps of Schwartz have effected so much, what may we not hope from the same men, when their means of usefulness are increased by your bounty? But, alas! they have a still stronger claim upon your hearts. They were the object of the deepest interest and most intense anxiety to our dear lamented bishop. It would be hardly too much to say, that his benevolent mind was ever fixed on the sacrifice of their faith; for he died while caring for their welfare, and laboring for their good. He had seen every part of India, but he had seen nothing like the society's missions at Tanjore. Again and again did he repeat to me, 'Here is the strength of the Christian cause in India. It would indeed be a grievous and heavy sin, if England, and all the agents of its bounty, do not nourish and protect these churches.'"

On the occasion of this communication, a desire to accomplish as far as possible the plans of the lamented prelate prevailed in every bosom; and at a special general meeting, although the superintendence of the missions had been transferred to the Society for the propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, it was resolved to carry the recommendations of bishop Heber into full effect. In pursuance of this resolution, it was determined to expend the sum of 4,500 pounds, partly in building, repairing, and enlarging churches, chapels, missionary premises, and school-houses in the Tanjore district, partly in extending the mission-press at Vepery, and partly in the endowment of two additional scholarships at Bishop's college, Calcutta, to be forever called bishop Heber's scholarships, and to be appropriated, in compliance with his earnest wish and recommendation, to the maintenance and education of members of foreign episcopal churches in the East, not in subordination to the see of Rome.

J. C. Kohlhoff and Adam Compton Thompson are new missionaries of the Gospel Propagation society in Tanjore. Children under instruction, 1,586. Many youths in the English school are promising.

TAUAI; one of the Sandwich islands, on which is a station of the A. B. C. F. M.

TAVOY; the name of a country, river, and town, in Birmah, S. of Pegu, which were taken from Siam by the emperor of Birmah. The province Tavoy is now in the possession of the British. The American Baptist Board maintain a station at Tavoy.

Tavoy has 9,000 inhabitants, among whom are 200 priests of Gundong.

TELLICHERRY; a sea-port town of a province of the same name in Southern India, N. lat. 11° 45'. It is N. W. of Cochin. It was long the chief English settlement on this coast, but has declined since the company's commerce was removed to Mahé. The richest natives still reside here, and the inhabitants are far more civilized than in the rest of the province. It has an arsenal, and is a great mart for Malabar goods. The C. M. S. commenced a mission here in 1817.

No rate report has been received respecting Tellicherry.

THATTA MOONSHEE; a village connected with the Pulicat station, Southern India, where there is a flourishing school.

THEOPOLIS; a station of the L. M. S. in South Africa, 550 miles E. of Cape Town.

G. Barker and Christopher Sass are missionaries at Theopolis. The congregations are good. Communicants, 81. Their conduct is satisfactory. Sixteen of them were added in the year. Day scholars, 132 to 194; infant, 115. The infant school system seems admirably adapted to the Hottentots. The Temperance society has proved very beneficial.

THOMAS, Sr.; one of the Little Antilles, West Indies, belonging to Denmark. The latitude of the port is 18° 20' N., lon. 65° 3' W. It is an important commercial station. The largest harbor may hold with safety a hundred ships of war; the storehouses are loaded with merchandise brought from Europe or America.

The U. B. established a mission on this island in 1732. Mr. Dober commenced the mission, the earliest of the brethren's efforts in that quarter of the world. We copy the following sentences from a new work on the Origin and History of Missions:

"During the year 1733, many of the inhabitants of St. Thomas were carried off by famine and contagious diseases; and a rebellion of the negroes at St. Jan, which continued about six months, and was marked by a series of horrid atrocities, spread terror and devastation through this and the adjacent islands. The labors of this devoted missionary were, of course, rendered doubly difficult; but, whilst he was struggling with poverty, and almost sinking beneath his anxious cares, a party of fourteen brethren and four sisters were on their way from Europe, partly designed to aid in the instruction of the slaves at St. Thomas, and partly destined to commence a new mission in the island of St. Croix.

"These, however, were not the only trials with which the faith and patience of the missionaries were exercised; but in the month of October, 1738, both Martin and Freundlich, with the wife of the latter, were incarcerated in prison, without having committed or participated in crime of any description. The facts, as stated by an intelligent and respectable writer, were these: A person of the name of Frelter, who had been originally sent out as a missionary to the island of St. Croix, and afterwards withdrawn from the brethren, had recently taken up his abode in St. Thomas, with a view to the improvement of his worldly circumstances. The difference in his conduct and that of the missionaries was so obvious, that even the converted negroes did not consider him as a brother. Martin, however, did not entirely withdraw from him, but used every exertion in his power to recover him from the snares into which he had unhappily fallen. At the time to which we are now alluding, Frelter was taken up and committed to prison, on the charge of having stolen and secreted in his chest various articles belonging to the lord chamberlain Pless, to the value of about fifteen six-dollars. It was now suggested that Martin and Freundlich must have had some knowledge of this robbery, and they were accordingly summoned to give evidence upon oath, before a court of judicature, relative to this transaction. They were now placed in a complete dilemma, as their religious principles precluded them from taking the oath required, and their order of answering any questions with the strictest veracity, and as in the presence of God, proved unassailable. No consideration, however, could induce them to violate the dictates of their consciences; and the result was, that they were fined thirty six-dollars, and, in consequence of their inability to raise such a sum, they were committed to prison, with the wife of Freundlich, and, in that situation, their fine was increased, first to 60, and afterwards to 90 six-dollars.

"Whilst the missionaries remained in confinement, and before they could convey any intelligence of their misfortunes to their friends in Europe, count Zuzze idorf was providentially led to visit St. Thomas, and, about the end of January, 1739, he arrived in that island with two brethren and their wives, who were designed to assist in the instruction of the negroes. He immediately waited on the governor, and obtained the liberation of the missionaries; and it is pleasing to add, that Frelter himself was subsequently liberated from confinement, as no proof could be brought forward to substantiate the foul and cruel charge which was brought against him.

"It appears, from authentic documents, that in one day 40, and on another 90, negroes were admitted into the church by the solemn rite of baptism; but, whilst the hearts of the missionaries exulted in the extension and success of their labors, their constitutions began to sink, and breaches were frequently made among them by death. In the European congregations, however, persons were always found possessing sufficient zeal for the cause of Christ, and sufficient affection for the souls of men, to induce them to supply the places of those who had entered into the rest which remaineth for the people of God.

"In 1801, hostilities having commenced between Great Britain and Denmark, an English fleet appeared off the coast of St. Thomas, and, as resistance was impracticable against such superior force, the commandant was under the necessity capitulating. An effusion of human blood was thus happily prevented.

"It appears that, for the last few years, this mission has been advancing. In 1825, the missionary Hope gave pleasing statements respecting the prospects in the Danish islands as to the grand object, viz. the blessing attending, and the fruit arising from the preaching of the gospel. In the 19th of February, 1825, there was a dreadful conflagration in the town of St. Thomas; the mission-house and church were spared; but many free negroes, belonging to the congregation at Niesky, lost their all. This year, missionaries were sent out, both from Europe and the United States. Mr. and Mrs. Eberman sailed from Philadelphia, in the brig Seaborer, bound to St. Thomas. At the distance of about 20 miles on this side of the capes of Delaware, the vessel was struck by a violent squall and instantly thrown on her side. Brother Eberman, together with other passengers, and the captain and crew, were enabled to support themselves above water by holding fast to the rigging. The helpless situation of sister Eberman prevented her, alone, from extricating herself from the baggage; which, as the cabin filled with water, was drifting about, and completely jammed her in. Providentially, she, by supporting herself on the floating trunks, was enabled to push forward with judicious exertion, so that, although she was up to the chin in the water, room was left for respiration. Notwithstanding every exertion on the part of the captain and crew, it was impossible to come to her assistance; nor could an attempt be made to cut her out, every thing movable having been washed over-board. But it pleased God to send help in time. About half an hour after the vessel had been struck, another outward-bound vessel approached; and by the kind and judicious exertions of her captain, who boarded in a boat, and brought the necessary tools, a hole was cut through the side of the vessel, just above the head of sister Eberman; through this opening she was drawn out, before life had fled, after she had remained in imminent danger of death for near an hour.

"In 1829, the new mission premises at Niesky were completed, and the brethren had the gratification to occupy them upon the 7th of July.

In St. Thomas in 1823, two stations, six missionaries. Congregation, 1685.

THOMAS; a station of the American Baptist Board for Foreign Missions among the Otawas, or Utawas Indians, on Grand river, a branch of Lake Michigan, in the Michigan territory. It is under the superintendence of Mr. Leonard Slater.

TILLIPALLY; a parish in the district of Jaffna, Ceylon, seven or eight miles from Batticotta, nine miles N. of Jaffnapattam. This station was occupied by the Rev. Messrs. Warren and Poor, of the A. B. C. F. M., in 1816.

Tillipally is now occupied by Rev. B. C. Meigs and wife. On the 11th of August, 1833, the meeting-house at this station was set on fire and consumed, with nearly all the Tamil books and tracts. The number of children who attend meeting is 472, and 90 adults. Native free schools, 20. Scholars, 907, of whom 240 can read.

TINNEVELLY; a province of Southern India, which occupies the extremities of the Carnatic, and of the whole peninsula, being separated from the province of Travancore on the west coast by the Travancore ridge of mountains, a continuation of the western Ghauts. It contains a large tract of low land, and a great number of high mountains and hills. A fall of rain is always expected late in January, which raises the rivers and replenishes the tanks. Great effects have resulted from the preaching of the gospel in this district, ever since the days of Mr. Schwartz.

In June, 1833, the Tinnevelly schools were 112; boys, 2,552; girls, 147.

TIPTON COUNTY, (TENNESSEE) where Hugh Wilson, his wife, and Prudence Wilson, of the A. B. C. F. M., have established schools, &c. for a part of the Chickasaws.

TONAWANDA; a station of the American Baptist Board for Foreign Missions among the Seneca Indians, in the state of New York.

TONGA, or TONGATABOO; the principal of the Friendly islands, 21° 7' S. lat., 175° 19' W. lon. This group rank nearly the first in the Archipelago in Polynesia for the industry of the inhabitants, and the degree of political order which prevails in it. Infanticide and several other Tahitian institutions are unknown among them. Conjugal infidelity in the upper classes has been severely punished. The women are in a state of slavery. Tonga has a large and excellent harbor, which admits of being fortified. The W. M. S. have had a mission on these islands for a number of years.

The missions on the Tonga islands were commenced in 1822. The missionaries now in 1833, are Peter Turner, James Watkins, and W. Woon. The station is at Nukunalo, which see. The changes at this station, and on the Friendly islands generally, strikingly resemble the moral reformation which took place at the Society and Sandwich islands. The missionaries have cause to rejoice with trembling. It appears that on the Tonga and Haabai islands, there were 1100 members, and 1920 scholars, under the care of 151 native teachers. God seems to be with them of a truth.

"Brother and sister Thomas are still with us, waiting for a favorable opportunity to go to the Haabai, where the prospect seems to be increasingly good. We have heard that the king has taken some bold steps towards the destruction of their idolatrous system throughout the whole of these islands; and that the way is now perfectly open to the whole of the group, for the introduction of the meliorating and saving doctrines of the gospel."

TORTOLA; the principal of the Virgin islands, in the West Indies, 12 miles long, and four broad. It belonged to the Dutch, who built a strong fort, from which they were expelled by the British in 1666. The harbor is at the east end of the island. W. lon. 64° 50', N. lat. 15° 28'. The number of inhabitants is 1,000, of whom 9,000 were slaves. The population has considerably decreased.

TREBIZOND, is situated on the S. E. shore of the Black sea. Population, 15,000. It will be the means of communicating with Erzerom, Persia, and Thomas Johnson and wife, of the A. B. C. F. M., were proceeding thither in 1834.

TRICHINOPOLY; a city of Hindostan, in the Carnatic, capital of a fertile district, which was formerly a principality. It is surrounded by a double wall, with towers and a ditch; and stands on the south side of the Cavery, which a little above divides into branches, and forms, opposite the city, the island of Seringham; on which are two magnificent paradises. It is 27 miles W. by N. of Tanjore. E. lon. 78° 50', N. lat. 10° 50'.

Mr. Schwartz, from the C. K. S., commenced a mission here in 1766. Rev. Christian Poble succeeded him.

On Sunday, the 2nd of April, 1826, the morning after his arrival at Trichinopoly, bishop Heler preached at St. John's church, (the government church, which had been consecrated by bishop Middleton,) with all his accustomed animation; and in the evening administered confirmation to 42 candidates, and delivered his charge to them with something more than his ordinary impressiveness and affection of manner. On the following morning, at day-break, he attended divine service in the Tamil language, at the mission church in the fort, and confirmed fifteen natives, in their own tongue. He inspected the schools and the mission-house, and received an address from the poor Christians, earnestly praying that he would send some pastor to watch over them and instruct them. He answered them with all that gentleness and kindness of manner which never failed to win every heart; and assured them that he would immediately provide for their wants.

"There is a church in the fort," says the Rev. Thomas Robinson, in 1826, capable of "containing 1500 or 2,000 persons, but requiring considerable repairs and a house for the residence of the missionary, with small school rooms for Tamil and English. The present number of the congregation is 490 persons; and it is melancholy to find this number annually decreasing, entirely from the want of a resident European missionary, and the necessary establishment of catechists and schoolmasters, for which the funds have hitherto been utterly inadequate. The whole income of the mission appears to be about 30 rupees per month, and can hardly be desired with a field of greater promise than this interesting congregation. Laborers only are wanting to make it realize, to its fullest extent, the hopes of its first founder, and of its last friend, (bishop Heler.) It was his lordship's intention to place here a resident missionary, with as little delay as possible; and to make other arrangements for its future prosperity." These intentions, it appears, will not be altogether frustrated. An appeal made by Mr. Robinson to the liberality of the British inhabitants of Trichinopoly, was nobly answered on the following morning, when a meeting was convened at the church for this object.

At Trichinopoly, in 1834, H. D. Schroyvogel, missionary. Four weekly services: 39 baptized; 138 communicants; 340 scholars in 13 schools.

TRINCOMALEE; the most important station on the coast of Ceylon, from the north and commanding the harbor which it possesses, capable of affording an ample protection to an extended commerce. It is 8° 25' N. lat. It is better situated for a marine depot than any other station in India. It has a great variety of romantic and sublime prospects. The W. M. S. commenced a mission here in 1821.

In two schools in Trincomalee are 60 scholars. Solomon Vallopallo, native assistant. Mr. Roberts has returned home.

TRINIDAD, or TRINITY; one of the Great Antilles, West Indies, situated between Tobago and the continent of South America, from which it is separated by the gulf of Paria and two straits. The island is about 60 or 70 miles from E. to W., and nearly 50 from N. to S. The most remarkable phenomenon is a bituminous lake, situated on the western coast. Trinidad was colonized by persons from different European countries. The English obtained possession of it by the treaty of 1801. It is important on account of its fertility, its extent, and its position. A mission was commenced on this island by the W. M. S. in 1788.

TRIPASSORE; an outstation of the Madras mission of the L. M. S., 30 miles from Madras. Nallappan and Joel, native assistants, who appear to be faithful men. Communicants, 25. Scholars, 53. An English branch is in a prosperous state.

TULBAGH; a town of Cape Colony, South Africa, 75 miles N. E. of Cape Town. Rev. Arie Vos, of the L. M. S., missionary.

Mr. Vos is still endeavoring to prosecute his interesting and important work among the thousands around him. He has four meetings every week at Tulbagh. The attendance, consisting of Hottentots and slaves, is increasing. The services comprise preaching and catechizing. Mr. Vos has a catechetical exercise with the people, on the contents of the Bible; going through the sacred volume from the beginning. There is also a prayer meeting, twice a month, for the spread of the gospel; upon which occasions those who are candidates for baptism, or the Lord's supper, are specially catechized. He has baptized one youth and three children, and there are three adult candidates for baptism. The total number baptized is ten adults and eight children. One adult and three children have departed this life in the course of the past year.

"But Mr. Vos is principally employed in visiting the different villages and farms within a circuit of about 210 miles. He is in the habit of making two tours alternately, and visiting about 35 or 40 different places each tour, preaching to about two thousand or three thousand farmers, Hottentots, and slaves. Twice a year he visits the town of Worcester, 36 miles from Tulbagh, and during the few days he remains, each time, in that town, he preaches to the Hottentots and slaves, when about 80 attend. On these occasions he also has divine worship in the prison.

"Mr. Vos remarks, that he formerly met with much prejudice against his instructing the heathen, but that now, on the contrary, he experiences great kindness and hospitality from the farmers and others whom he visits, and whose slaves he endeavors to instruct. And we are happy to add, that the effects of his labors, in a moral and religious point of view, are stated to be obvious and encouraging. Intoxication, to which the Hottentots and slaves in that quarter were greatly addicted, has ceased to be prevalent; and it is stated to be a rare circumstance to see a person, belonging to these classes of society, in this quarter, in a state of intoxication."

Arie Vos remains at Tulbagh. The aged and excellent Mrs. Vos has died. Mr. Vos laments the want of greater spirituality among his converts. Sixty scholars make good progress.

TUSCARORAS; a remnant of the Six Nations of Indians residing about four miles from Lewiston, Niagara county, New York. The New York Missionary society commenced a mission among them in 1800. In 1821, it was transferred to the U. F. M. S., and in 1826, to the A. B. C. F. M.

The missionaries among the Tuscaroras, in 1835, are William Wilkins, his wife, and Elizabeth Stone. A very promising state of religious feeling has existed during the past year among the Indians. Two were received to the church.

U.

UITENHAGE; an outstation of the L. M. S. near Bethelsdorp, South Africa. Mr. Sass, on account of his ill health, has been obliged to retire to Theopolis.

J. G. Messer is a missionary at Uitenhage. Two services are held on Sunday and three in the week. Congregation advance in numbers and piety. Adults baptized, 17. Adult evening school, 60. Three hundredrix-dollars, besides materials, have been subscribed for a chapel, 52 feet by 26 within. Temperance society has 140 members.

UNION; a station of the A. B. C. F. M. among the Osages, W. of the river Mississippi. It is one mile W. of the river Neosho, 26 N. of Fort Gibson, about 150 miles N. W. of Dwight, 33 miles E. of the western boundary of the Arkansas territory. It falls within the territory of the Cherokees who removed W. of the Mississippi.

V.

VAITORARÉ; a station of the L. M. S. on Tahaa, one of the Society islands.

VALLEY TOWNS; a station of the A. B. F. M. among the Cherokee Indians, in the S. E. part of Tennessee. It was commenced in 1818.

VAN DEMAN'S LAND; a fertile island in the Southern ocean, separated from New Holland by Bass straits. It is 176 miles long and 150 miles broad. E. lon. 145°-148° S. lat. 40°-43°. The W. M. S. established a mission here in 1820.

YAVOU; a number of islands included in the Friendly, in above 20° S. lat. and 175° W. lon. The mission of the W. M. S. was established in 1831. W. Cross, missionary.

From the island of Yavou, the intelligence is of the most gratifying character. The king of Haaboi has been instrumental in turning the king of Yavou and one thousand of his people from idolatry to the worship of the true God. In visiting the Yavou chief on worldly business, he improved the opportunity to a higher purpose; the chief of Yavou yielded to his reasonings and entreaties, and consented to put away his "lying spirits." After a Sabbath passed in the worship of God, he gave orders to set fire to the temples; his orders were cheerfully obeyed; and in three days they were reduced to ashes, with the idols which they contained, and which had been the objects of religious worship for successive generations. The signal and bloodless victory obtained over the idolatrous forces, which had assembled to make war on the king and extirpate the new faith, appears likely to be overruled to its furtherance and establishment. The chief is most hearty in the cause of Christ, and longs to see idolatry banished out of all the islands. At his pressing request, a missionary has been sent from Tonga to instruct him and his inquiring people more perfectly in the way of salvation; but the exertions of one individual will be very inadequate to meet the spiritual necessities of the whole population of Yavou. Mr. Thomas, in a recent letter, says, "Send us more missionaries, and send them now." A king and his people are waiting for God's law! Satan's cause trembles and falls at the name of Jesus. Idolatry crumbles to the dust. Come, oh come! to the help of the Lord against the mighty."

VEPERY; a station of the G. P. S. near Madras, commenced in 1727 by the C. K. S. and long carried on by them. J. L. Irlon, missionary, two catechists, and six native assistants. Dr. Rottler, on account of advanced age, has retired from the active duties of his station. Baptized, 7; communicants, 411; schools, 27; scholars, 1071; 48 native in the seminary.

VIZAGAPATAM; a station of the L. M. S. in South India, a seaboard, rt. 483 miles N. E. of Madras, and 557 S. W. of Calcutta. Inhabitants, chiefly Hindoos, between 30,000 and 40,000. Prevalent language, Telougo. Begun in 1805. No report since the death of Mr. Dawson, the missionary at the station.

VOSSANIE'S TRIBE; a station of the U. B. S. in South Africa, commenced in 1830. Richard Haddy, missionary.

Congregation in Vossanie's Tribe, 70; members, 11; scholars, 15 to 30; inquirers, 8. The new converts are promising.

W.

WAGENMAKER VALLEY; a station of the French Protestant Missionary Society, in South Africa, commenced in 1830. Isaac Bisoux, missionary.

Further spiritual fruit has been gathered in this valley. Mr. Bisoux greatly conciliates, by his spirit and manners, both the colonists and slaves. He has married the daughter of one of the French refugees.

WAILALUA; a station of the A. B. C. F. M. on the island of Oahu, one of the Sandwich Islands. John S. Emerson, missionary, and wife.

WAILUKU; a station of the A. B. C. F. M. on Maui, one of the Sandwich group. Jonathan S. Green and Reuben Tinker, missionaries, and their wives.

WAIMATE; a station of the C. M. S. in New Zealand, begun in 1831. W. Yates, missionary.

WAIMEA; a station of the A. B. C. F. M. in Kauai, Samuel Whitney and Peter J. Gulick, missionaries, and their wives. Readers, 3,000. For particulars respecting Waimea, Wailuku, and Wailua, see SANDWICH ISLANDS.

WAUGH-TOWN; a station of the L. M. S. on Tahiti, one of the Georgian Islands.

Mr. J. Wilson is now the missionary at Waugh-Town. No recent report.

WELLINGTON; a town of liberated negroes in the colony of Sierra Leone, Western Africa. Average attendance at Wellington in March, 1834, on public worship, 400 to 500. The attendance is satisfactory; 71 children attend the school at Kiskey. The people were urgent in their applications. (See SIERRA LEONE.)

WELLINGTON VALLEY, in New South Wales, 200 miles N. W. of Sydney, where the C. M. S. began a mission in 1832. W. Watson, John S. C. Handt, missionaries.

WESLEYVILLE; a station of the W. M. in South Africa, 10 or 12 miles from the mouth of the Kalamna, in Pato's tribe: 1823, S. Young. The congregations continue large; many persons are obliged to remain outside of a new stone chapel is in progress. "Notwithstanding," Mr. Young writes, "the great distress of the people, arising from a want of provisions and the political agitations with which they have been disturbed, yet we have had several gracious manifestations of the influence of the Holy Spirit, by which the stout-hearted sinner has been humbled and the Savior exalted. The congregations to which we preach in various parts of the tribe are increasingly encouraging." Five members have left the station: some of them, there is reason to fear, from a loss of religion. Scholars—boys, 28; girls, 34; adults, 4; being a decrease, in consequence of the removal of several large families from the vicinity; the schools, however, go on well.

Seven or eight thousand people reside in Pato's tribe, of whom 300 reside in the settlement. Members, 47. Adults baptized last year, 18. Scholars, 118, including 20 or 30 catechumens. W. Shepstone, missionary.

WEST COAST; a station of the L. M. S. in Demerara, South America. James Scott, missionary. Communicants, 136. Congregation, 500. Powerful revival of religion.

WEST INDIES. Owing to the insurrections which occurred in these islands in 1832-3, the consequent breaking up of many of the missionary stations, and the effects of the recent emancipation law, we cannot give a very accurate or recent account of the missions.

WHEELLOCK; a station of the A. B. C. F. M. among the Western Cherokee. Alfred Wright, missionary, and his wife. Communicants, 71.

WILKS' HARBOR; a mission station of the L. M. S., on the N. E. side of the island of Tahiti.

George Pritchard is missionary at Wilks' Harbor. A large quantity of rum has been imported, chiefly by American whalers, which has operated most unfavorably on the morals of the people.

WILLTOWN; a station of the A. B. C. F. M. among the Cherokee Indians, in the chartered limits of Alabama, in Will's valley, about ten miles from the western line of Georgia, and 40 miles S. of the Tennessee river. It was commenced in 1823.

The missionaries at Willtown, in 1834, were William Chamberlain and his wife, Nancy Thomson, and John Huss, native preacher. Huss has six schools, with 90 pupils, which are established in the Cherokee villages, for the purpose of teaching the Cherokees to read.

WUPPERTHAL, New; a station of the Rhenish Missionary Society, six miles from Clan William, South Africa. Theobald Von Wurmb, John Leipoldt, J. G. Knaib, missionaries.

Y.

YELLOW LAKE; a station of the A. B. C. F. M. among the Ojibwas. F. Ayer, teacher, his wife, Joseph Town, teacher, Hester Crooks, native teacher, are employed. A school is taught.

Z.

ZANTE; the largest of the Ionian islands, after Corfu and Cephalonia; 15 miles long, 8 broad; 169 square miles. Population, 40,000. Zante, the capital, has 20,000 souls. Walter O. Croggon is the missionary of the W. M. S. on this island.

ZOOLOHNS. On recommendation of the Rev. Dr. Philip, of Cape Town, the committee of the A. B. C. F. M. have made arrangements for commencing a mission among the Zoolohs of South-Eastern Africa, and for commencing it simultaneously in the two separate communities of which that people is at present composed. The mission will probably embark near the end of the present year, and each branch will consist of two ministers of the gospel and a physician, with their wives. The part which is destined for the maritime community, situated between Port Natal and Delagoa bay, and under the government of Dinganeau, will probably be landed at Port Natal. The other community is situated in the interior, and is governed by a chief, called Maslekutai. The part of the mission designed for this people will go by the way of Cape Town. The Zoolohs speak the same language, and till recently were under the same head. Their customs and modes of government are the same.

APPENDIX.

AMETHYST. There seems to be no reason for doubting the propriety of rendering the Hebrew achmethel, and the Greek amethystos, by amethyst. Pliny says the reason assigned for its name is, that though it approaches to the color of wine, it falls short of it, and stops at a violet color. Others think it is called amethyst, because its color resembles wine mixed with water; and in this view, also, it derives its name from a, negative, and methy, wine.

The oriental amethyst is an extremely rare gem. If heated it loses its color, and becomes transparent, in which state it is hardly distinguishable from the diamond. (See ЖАКРИТЪ.—Abbott.)

B.

BARBAULD, (ANNA LETITIA), a distinguished female writer, was born at Kithworth, in Leicestershire, England, in 1743. She received an excellent education from her father, the Rev. Dr. Aikin. Such was the quickness of her apprehension in earliest infancy, that, according to the testimony of her mother; she was able "at two years old to read without spelling, and in half a year more, as well as most women."

At Kithworth, she had not one congenial associate of her own sex; but the love of rural nature, the few but choice books of her father's library, and the spirit of devotion early inculcated by her enlightened and pious mother, (who herself had profited much from the society of the celebrated Dr. Doddridge,) opened for her by degrees an exhaustless source of tender and sublime delight. In her fifteenth year, her father's removal to Warrington, in Lancashire, brought her into the society of several distinguished men, among whom were Drs. Enfield and Priestley.

In 1772, her brother's urgent persuasions so far overcame her reluctance to appear as an author, that she published a volume of poems; which gained for her a high place in the esteem of the literary world. Four editions were called for within the year of publication. The next year she was again persuaded to join him in giving to the press a volume of "Miscellaneous Pieces in Prose." This also has been much admired, and often reprinted. Her marriage to the Rev. Rochester Barbauld took place in 1774. About this time she was requested by Mrs. Montague and others, admirers of her genius, to open a literary academy for young ladies of rank, which she declined, in a letter full of good sense, modesty, and just views of the habits and acquirements most important to her sex. Afterwards she assisted her husband in his boarding school at Palgrave, in Suffolk, which flourished for eleven years with great celebrity; when, the business of tuition proving too fatiguing, it was given up. In 1785, they visited the continent. In 1786, her husband settled at Hampstead, where he remained until 1802, when he succeeded Dr. Price as pastor of the congregation at Newington Green. Here she was brought once more into the society of her only brother, John Aikin, M. D. which she was permitted to enjoy for the following twenty years. In 1803, she lost her husband by one of the most melancholy of human maladies. Mrs. Barbauld had the fortune to seek relief from dejection in literary occupation. In 1822 she lost her brother. She herself was suffering from an asthmatic complaint, which slowly undermined her excellent constitution, but which she looked upon with joy as her passport to a better world. She expired March 9, 1835.

To claim for this distinguished woman the praise of purity and elevation of mind may well appear superfluous. It is higher and rarer commendation to say that she was not only free from envy, the bane of literary competition, but that she especially delighted in "a sister's praise," even though that sister were a rival. She passed through death without having dropped a friend, or created a personal enemy. "Her strong sense, her feelings, her energy, her principle, her patriot feelings, her pious, rational yet ardent—all these mark a character of no common sort." In her excellent productions we are uncertain which most to admire, the sagacious discrimination of intellect, the practical good sense and acute observation of life which suggest the remarks; or the spirited and expressive style, which rouses the attention, strikes the imagination, and carries them with conviction to the heart. The small bulk of her writings, compared with the long course of years in which she exercised her pen, is a sufficient proof that she offered to the public none but the happiest inspirations of her muse, and not even these till they had received all the polish of which she judged them susceptible. To a friend who had expressed his surprise at not finding inserted in her volume a poem which he had admired in manuscript, she well and characteristically replied: "I had rather it should be left to her pious, rational yet ardent—all these mark a character of no common sort." In her excellent productions we are uncertain which most to admire, the sagacious discrimination of intellect, the practical good sense and acute observation of life which suggest the remarks; or the spirited and expressive style, which rouses the attention, strikes the imagination, and carries them with conviction to the heart. Mrs. Barbauld had no children of her own, but she adopted and educated Charles, the third son of her brother. The child being received into her family under two years of age, she for his use prepared those "Early Lessons" which have justly gained for her the reverence and love of both parents and children; a work which may safely be asserted to have formed an era in the art of early instruction. For the benefit of a little class of almost infant scholars, whose parents solicited her tuition, she composed her "Hymns in Prose for Children." None of her works is a fairer monument of the elevation of her soul, and the brightness of her genius; none has been more popular, none more useful. It was her peculiar object in these hymns, "to impress devotional feelings as early as possible on the infant mind, by connecting religion with a variety of sensible objects, with all the infant sees, all he hears, all that affects his young mind with wonder or delight; and thus, by deep, strong, and permanent associations, to lay the best foundation for practical devotion in future life."

Besides these, her most celebrated productions are, a poetical epistle to Mr. Withersford; Eighteen hundred and Eleven, a poem; Biographical and Critical Essays; Thoughts on Devotional Poetry, on Sects, and Establishments; and Familiar Letters; which last were published by her friends after her decease.—Life of Mrs. Barbauld, by Miss Lucy Aikin.

BÉDELL, (GREGORY T., D. D.) This excellent minister of Christ was born in the city of New York, October, 1791. He was educated at Columbia college, and at the conclusion of his preparatory theological studies, entered the ministry of the Protestant Episcopal church, at the age of 22. He was settled as a parish minister successively at Hudson, (N. Y.), Fayetteville, (N. C.) from 1816 to 1822, and for the last twelve years of his life, as the rector of St. Andrew's church, Philadelphia. Though useful in an increasing degree every preceding year of his ministry, it was in this last station chiefly that God made him the minister of spiritual good. His valuable life closed while on a journey, at Baltimore, August 30, 1834, at the age of 43.

Under whatever aspect the character and life of Dr. Bedell is regarded, he will be found to have had few superiors. As a Christian he was eminently holy, patient, and attractive. As a minister of Christ he was made remarkably powerful and successful. As a writer he was in a high degree talented, interesting, and useful. As a public speaker he was regarded as a model of dignified, chaste, and impressive elocution. His voice was one of the most sweet and musical we ever heard. In his character there was a very rare combination of a large proportion of the soft and winning attributes of modesty and retirement, with the boldness and perseverance of the undaunted and the enterprising. He was equally remarkable for the simplicity and kindness, the fidelity and impressiveness with which he preached the great truths of the gospel, and the ease with which he employed all his varied acquirements in their illustration and enforcement. He was never weary of presenting Christ and his salvation before the crowds that attended his ministry, and tenderly urging him upon their hearts. This was his peculiar characteristic, and this was the secret of his success. Hundreds of immortal beings, who "passed from death unto life" under his ministry, attest this fact. He was also remarkable for his pastoral assiduity and diligence, and for the large proportion of benevolent enterprises which he infused into his church and congregation. In his private ministrations, seriousness and gentleness, fidelity and forbearance, decision and perseverance, were beautifully combined. Few men have made so much of time as he did, or have been able to endure and effect so much. For twelve years he had not one day of perfect health, nor probably one day of freedom from serious pain. Yet his habit of Christian self-command resisted the spirit of indolence and lassitude, and kept his powers up to their possible amount of work in each day of his life. He was constantly occupied in devising or executing some plan of usefulness, something to glorify God and do good to men.

Correspondent with such a life was the manner of his death. Shortly before his decease, he rallied his remaining powers for a last effort in the cause of the blessed Savior. Calling his family and friends around him, he said with affecting emphasis, "Hear me! I acknowledge myself to have been a most inopportune servant—unprofitable, not hypocritical. I find myself to have been full of sin, ignorance, weakness, unfaithfulness and guilt. But Jesus is my hope; washed in his blood, justified by his righteousness, sanctified by his grace, I have peace with God; Jesus is very precious to my soul; my 'all in all,' and I expect to be saved by free grace through his atoning blood. This is my testimony;" and again he repeated with new emphasis, "This is my testimony."

Dr. Bedell was the projector and editor of the Religious Souvenir; and the author of various small but useful publications.—Religious Souvenir for 1835.

BELL, (ANDREW, D. D.) prebendary of Westminster, fellow of the Asiatic society, &c., the founder of the Bell or Madras system of instruction. He was born and educated at St. Andrews, in Scotland, and spent some part of his early life in America. In 1780, he went to India, and resided as a minister at Madras, where, having undertaken the superintendence of the Military Madras Orphan asylum, he formed and introduced the system of mutual instruction. In 1796 he returned to England, and submitted his report to the authorities at home. The system was soon afterwards adopted in that country, and has since been widely diffused over the civilized world. The establishment of 10,000 schools in Great Britain alone without any legislative assistance, in which 600,000 children are educated by voluntary aid and charity, speaks volumes in its favor. Dr. Bell had amassed a large fortune in India, which he distributed before his death among the institutions of Scotland. He died at Cluttenham, January 7, 1832, but his honored remains were conveyed to London, and deposited in Westminster Abbey. To his native city of St. Andrews he left 10,000 pounds, besides a sum of 50,000 pounds for the building and endowment of a new college at that place.—American Almanac, 1834.

BLOUNT, (CHARLES.) the youngest son of Sir Henry, was born in 1654, and made himself conspicuous by his deistical opinions, and by considerable talent. His Anna Mundi was suppressed, and publicly burnt. This work he followed up by three of the same kind: the Life of Apollonius Tyaneus; Great Ideas of the Philosophers; and Religio Laici. Of the revolution of 1688 he was a warm friend; but he acted little in consonance with its principles, when he published his King William and Queen Mary Conquerors, to assert their right to the crown by conquest. The commons ordered this tract to be burnt by the hangman. He shot himself, in 1693, in consequence of the sister of his deceased wife having refused to marry him.—Davenport.

BOARDMAN, (GEORGE DANIEL M.) American missionary to Burnah, and "the Apostle of the Karens;" was born at Livermore, Maine, February 1, 1801. He was distinguished in childhood by his love of books, his thirst for knowledge, and his capacity for acquiring and retaining it. He enjoyed academical advantages at Farmington and Bloomfield, and in May, 1819, entered Waterville college. He was the first student who experienced the renewing grace of God in that institution. In a letter written soon after his baptism, he says that when first sitting at the Lord's table, "the love of Christ appeared truly incomprehensible. I wanted to tell the world what a Savior I had found." He was subsequently tutor, and such were his talents and character that he was regarded as worthy to be the future president of the college; but his heart being deeply impressed with the condition of the heathen, he offered himself to the Baptist Board in April, 1823, and was by them appointed a missionary to Burnah. After spending some time in preparation at Andover, he was ordained, and sailed in company with Mrs. Boardman from Philadelphia for Calcutta, July 15, 1825. Arriving there December 2, and finding that the war was then raging in Burnah, he was induced to remain with Mr. and Mrs. Wade, until the conclusion of the war, studying the Burmese language, and preaching at the English chapel, Circular Road, Calcutta. He left for his first destination in the spring of 1827, and soon after arrived in Burnah, where he was settled at Maulmein, the capital of the British provinces. Here his labors were successful, and in the next year, he was chosen to found a new station at Tavoy. He arrived there April 9, 1828. In less than three years, he succeeded, under God, in gathering a Christian church of nearly 100 converted Karens, and died triumphantly in their arms, February 11, 1831. On his tombstone at Tavoy are these words: "Ask in the Christian villages of yonder mountains—Who taught you to abandon the worship of demons? Who raised you from vice to morality? Who brought you your Bibles, your Sabbaths, and your words of prayer? LET THE DEPLY BE HIS EULOGY." See the interesting Memoir of his Life, by Rev. Mr. King, 1831.

BONSTETEN, (CHARLES VICTOR DE;) a native of Berne, and distinguished as a moralist, politician, metaphysician, geologist, and traveller. He died at Geneva, February 3, 1832, at the age of 57.—Am. Almanac, 1834.

BROWN, (DEA. CHARLES.) Before closing this work filial love may perhaps be permitted to record a name, which if little distinguished in the world, is yet dear to many sincere friends of piety, as well as to the heart of the Editor. Mr. Brown was born in Waterford, Connecticut, October, 1779. He was bred up on his father's farm until the age of 21, when by over-exertion his constitution became so seriously impaired that he relinquished his former situation, and applying his mind to literary pursuits, soon became a successful instructor of youth. About this time also he felt the power of the gospel on his heart, and united with the first Baptist church in Waterford. Discovering his talents, in connexion with his ardent piety, the church soon gave him their approbation as a preacher of the gospel, and he labored for some years acceptably and usefully at Lyne and Colchester. In 1798 he married Miss Hester Darrow, youngest daughter of the Rev. Zadoc Darrow, the venerable pastor of the Waterford church, who died in February, 1827, in his 100th year. His connexion with this excellent woman was a source of unspeakable comfort to him through life. He charge, Mr. Brown supported himself for some time by trade. He established himself in business in the city of New London in 1804, in a very advantageous position; still continuing however to supply the pulpit as far as his health permitted. In 1808, the fraudulent conduct of a clerk suddenly blasted his worldly prospects, and involved him in bankruptcy. His usual upright and conscientious as his, nothing could have been more distressing than this, especially from the fear of its bringing a reproach upon religion. His private papers bear ample witness to his feelings on this point. Besides surrendering all his property, he immediately applied himself with all diligence to the means of paying up in full every demand; and notwithstanding his feeble health and increasing family, was permitted to accomplish his honest desires. Thus did Christianity gain a fresh triumph from this distressing trial.

In 1810, Mr. Brown removed to the state of New York, and was instrumental in establishing the first Baptist church in the city of Hudson, of which he continued a valued member and useful officer till his death, which took place June 5, 1817, at the age of 46. It was his last request to be buried by the side of his lamented pastor, Rev. Hervey Jenks, to whom he was greatly attached. His afflicted widow survived him but sixteen days. As she lived, so she died, a Christian, triumphantly exclaiming, "My time of praise is come!" Few instances of more devoted conjugal attachment, cemented by common intelligence, piety, affliction, and hope of a glorious immortality, can be found. One stone, reared over their remains by filial hands, bears the beautiful inscription, "They were lovely and pleasant in their lives, and in death they were not divided." Of their six children, two sons and two daughters still survive. Both sons are now (1835) engaged in the work of the Gospel ministry.—Am. Pop. Mag. for 1817; Private Memoirs.

BURDER, (GEORGE.) author of the Village Sermons, and secretary to the London Missionary society, was born in London, June 5, 1752. He seems to have become pious at 10 years old. His early character was remarkable chiefly for gravity and attention. He studied drawing for a time with Mr. Isaac Taylor, afterwards the excellent minister of Osnay, but his piety appears to have been injured by the society of some of the artists in his employ. In 1773 he entered as a student in the Royal academy. In 1775 he became a communicant at the Tabernacle chapel. The next year he became a subscriber and director of the Evangelical society, and entered upon the study of Greek and Hebrew. He soon after began to labor for the good of souls, by itinerant preaching. He also published the same year his little book on Early Osnay, which met with great and unexpected success. He was ordained pastor of an Independent church at Lancaster, October 29, 1778. In 1783 he removed to Coventry, where his usefulness was more widely extended. He was deeply interested in the establishment of the Evangelical Magazine in 1793, and the formation of the London Missionary society in 1795; and on the death of Rev. John Eyre, of London, in 1803, Mr. Burder succeeded him as pastor of the church in Fetter lane, editor of the Evangelical Magazine, and secretary of the London Missionary society. The duties of the latter office he discharged gratuitously until 1827, when age and infirmities compelled him to resign. His labors as a pastor were much valued, and largely blest, but his publications were still more so. Simple and unpretending as they are, but rich in evangelical truth, they have been best to the salvation of thousands in all parts of the world. Of his Cottage Sermons, Sermons for Seamen, and Sermons for the Aged, a million of copies have been circulated by the Religious Tract society. His Village Sermons also have been translated into various languages, and have been the means of the conversion, among others, of many English and Irish clergymen. They well deserve immortality. Mr. Burder also published an Abridgment of Owea on the Spirit, and Notes to Bunyan's Pilgrim and Holy War. This excellent man died May 29, 1832. "looking for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life."—See Memoir by his Son, H. F. Burder, D. D.

BUTLER, (CHARLES, ESQ.) "the reminiscer;" a voluminous author, king's counsel, and a conveyancer of extensive practice. He was a Roman Catholic, and a nephew of the Rev. Alban Butler, author of the Lives of the Saints. He was educated at the English college of Duany, and afterwards became a member of Lincoln's Inn. The bar was abolished to Roman Catholics till the passing of the relief act of 1791. Mr. Butler, therefore, was the first barrister of that communion, in modern times, who has risen to the rank of king's counsel. His publications evince talent and extensive acquirements. Among them are Horæ Biblicæ, Book of the Roman Catholic Church, and Reminiscences. He died in London, June 2, 1832, aged 82.

With respect to his own studies and habits he remarks: "Very early rising; a systematic division of time; abstinence from all company, and from all diversions not likely to amuse him highly, from reading, writing, or even thinking on modern party politics; and, above all, never permitting a bit or scrap of time to be unemployed—have supplied him with an abundance of literary hours. His literary acquisitions are principally owing to the rigid observance of four rules:—to direct his attention to one literary object only at a time; to read the best book upon it, consulting others as little as possible; when the subject was contentious, to read the best book upon each side; to find out men of information, and when in their society to listen, not to talk." "The chief aim of all my writings has been to put Catholics and Protestants into good humor with one another; and the Catholics into good humor with themselves."—Am. Almanac, 1834.

CALVIN, (JOHN.) The following recent tribute to the character of this great man, by George Bancroft, Esq. author of the History of the United States, is so important that we append it here to the history of his life.

It is also in season to rebuke the intolerance which would limit the praise of Calvin to a single sect. They who have no admiration but for wealth and rank can never admire the Geneva reformer, for though we possessed the richest mine of his age, he never emerged from the obscurity of rugged poverty. He lived in the day when nations were shaken to their centre, by the excitement of the Reformation; when the fields of Holland and France were wet with carnage of persecution; when vindictive monarchs on the one side threatened all Protestants with outlawry and death, and the Vatican on the other sent forth its anathemas and its cry for blood. In that day, it is too true, the influence of an ancient, long established, hardly dented error, the constant danger of his position, the intensity of modern republicanism among the antagonists of popery, the engrossing consciousness that his struggle was for the emancipation of the Christian world, induced the great reformer to defend the use of the sword for the extirpation of error. Reprobating and lamenting his adhesion to the cruel doctrine, which all Christians had for centuries implicitly received, we may, as republicans, remember that Calvin was not only the founder of a sect, but foremost among the most efficient of modern republicans; more truly benevolent to the human race than Solon, more self-denying than Lycurgus, the genius of Calvin infused enduring elements into the institutions of Geneva, and made it for the modern world the impregnable fortress of popular liberty, the fertile seed-plot of democracy.

"Again, we boast of our common schools; Calvin was the father of popular education, and the inventor of the system of free schools.

"Again, we are proud of the free states that fringe the Atlantic. The pilgrims of Plymouth were Calvinists; the best settlers in South Carolina came from the Calvinists of France; William Penn was the disciple of the Huguenots; the ships from Holland that first brought colonies to Manhattan were filled with Calvinists. He that will not honor the memory, and respect the influence of Calvin, knows but little of the origin of American liberty.

"Or do personal considerations chiefly win applause? Then no one merits our sympathy and our admiration more than Calvin; the young exile from France, who achieved an immortality of fame before he was twenty-eight years of age; now boldly reasoning with the king of France for religious liberty; now venturing as the apostle of truth to carry the new doctrines into the heart of Italy; and now hardly escaping from the fury of papal persecution; the purest writer, the keenest dialectician of his age; pushing free inquiry to its utmost verge, and yet valuing inquiry only as the means of arriving at fixed principles. The light of his genius scattered the mask of darkness which superstition had held for centuries before the brow of religion. His probity was unquestionable, his morals spotless. His only happiness consisted in the unquested, his tasks of glory and of good; for sorrow found its way into all his private relations. He was an exile from his country; he became for a season an exile from his place of exile. As a husband, he was doomed to mourn the premature loss of his wife; as a father he felt the bitter pang of burying his only child. Alone in the world, alone in a strange land, he went forward in his career with serene resignation and inflexible firmness; no love of ease turned him aside from his vigilance; no fear of danger lessened the nerve of his resolution; no bodily infirmities checked the incredible activity of his mind; and so he continued, year after year, solitary and feeble, yet toiling for humanity, till, after a life of glory, he tequeathed to his personal heirs a fortune, in books and furniture, stocks and money, not exceeding two hundred dollars, and to the world a purer reformation, a republican spirit in religion, with the kindred principles of republican liberty."—Northampton Courier.

CAREY (WILLIAM, D. D.) This eminent man, the pioneer of modern missions, and in many respects the most wonderful man of the age, was born August 17, 1791. He was the son of a poor man, and commenced business in life himself as a shoemaker. Upon his conversion he set himself to learn the original languages of Scripture, and became the minister of a Baptist congregation in Monks, England, supporting himself first by his trade and then by teaching a school.

Yet with him was the germ of a new age! As he became more acquainted with the condition of the various nations of the earth, by reading the narratives of voyagers and travellers, he felt great concern for the state of the heathen.

He now longed to commence a Baptist mission. At length a friend in Birmingham told him to write on the subject, and promised ten shillings towards the expense of printing. He did so, and the pamphlet was printed. This treatise was entitled, "An Inquiry into the Obligations of Christians to use means for the Conversion of the Heathen." The profits of this work were generously given towards increasing the funds of the missionary society, which was soon afterwards formed. At this time he had gained an uncommon knowledge of Latin, Greek, Hebrew, French, Dutch, Italian, &c., evincing that wonderful facility which is the gift of tongues, by which God had endowed him and raised him up for the great work of Bible translation. The missionary spirit continued to rise among his associated brethren, among whom were Fuller, Pearce, Ryland, Sutcliffe, &c., till, in May, 1792, he preached before the Northamptonshire association, at Nottingham, a discourse of overwhelming energy from Isa. 54: 23, on the obligation of the church to expect converts from the heathen, and to ATTEMPT TO BRING THEM TO CHRIST. The effect was irresistible. The association instantly resolved to prepare a plan for a Baptist missionary society. "The society was formed," says Dr. Ryland, "in Mr. Beeby Wallis' back parlor, October 2, 1792."

When the society was formed, the first questions presented were, in what part of the heathen world shall the work be commenced? and who will offer themselves as the first laborers in this untrodden and hazardous undertaking? The arrival of Mr. John Thomas from Hindostan, and the application by him to the society for their assistance in proclaiming the gospel in that country, decided the first point, and Mr. Carey promptly volunteering to accompany Mr. Thomas, the society was enabled to enter on the work of evangelizing the world, within a very comparatively short period after its formation.

Messrs. Carey and Thomas left for India in the ship Indra, with the consent of the East India company. When Dr. Carey came into Bengal, therefore, it was a principal object with him to conceal himself from the knowledge of government: and for a little time he occupied himself in the cultivation of recently redeemed jungle lands near Teakkee, about forty miles east from Calcutta; and, however, he was invited much suffering. A few months afterwards, however, he was invited to take charge of Mr. Udry to take charge of an indigo factory, and his colleague obtained a similar situation. Through the kindness of their employer, too, they obtained formal permission from government to continue in India. Dr. Carey continued thus situated from 1794 to the beginning of 1800; during which time he applied himself diligently to the study of the Bengalee language and then of the Sanskrit. He translated the Scriptures into Bengalee, and preached the gospel in it extensively, and supported several schools.

On the 10th of January, 1800, Dr. Carey came to Serampore, and united with Dr. Marshman, Mr. Ward, and others, lately arrived from Europe, in forming the mission which has since borne the name of this town. In the first year of his residence at Serampore, Dr. Carey's translation of the New Testament was nearly all printed. Dr. Carey's converts from Hindoism in Bengal were baptized. The Christian church which was then begun with a few individual believers in the gospel, has now branched into about twenty-four churches in different parts of India.

In 1801, Dr. Carey was chosen as Bengalee teacher in the newly instituted college of Fort William. He was afterwards appointed professor of Sanskrit and Mahatta, and by means he acquired an intimacy with learned pundits from all parts of India, through whom, in the course of years, he was enabled to translate the Scriptures into all the principal languages of northern Hindostan. For the students in the college, he had to compile grammars of the languages he taught them; and after many years he completed his voluminous Bengalee dictionary, which was not less celebrated as a man of science, history, and natural history, he began to study long before he left England; and India opened to him a wide field of observation, which he examined with untiring assiduity from his first arrival until his strength utterly failed him.

As a philanthropist, Dr. Carey is entitled to a high rank. He sought and gained the prevention of infanticide at Gouga Saur, and was amongst the first, if not the first, that engaged in seeking the abolition of suttee, and chiefly through his exertions the inhuman of Walseley left to his successors in the government of India a minute, declaring his conviction that suttees might and ought to be abolished. Had he continued in the government, he would have abolished them. Dr. Carey also took an active part in attempting the establishment of a leper hospital in Calcutta. He was the founder of the Agricultural society. And indeed scarcely any undertaking for the benefit of the country has been engaged in, of which he was not either a prime mover or a zealous promoter.

It was, however, as a Christian, a missionary, and a translator of the sacred Scriptures, that Dr. Carey shone pre-eminently. Their obligations to him in these respects the people of India have yet in a great degree to learn. They will however learn; all Bengalees at least may thank him for this: before his days, the Bengalee language was unknown, and had never been reduced to grammatical rule. Pundits would not write it, and there was scarcely a book in it worth reading. It is now rich, refined, and expressive; and scholarship in it is generally sought both by natives and foreigners, and to Dr. Carey and the publishers he employed, and whose labors he directed, the change is principally owing.

Of the extent of his labors in the great work of enabling every member of the family of man to read in his own tongue the wonderful works of God, some idea may be formed when we state, that the Serampore press, in supplying which with various versions of the sacred Scriptures he was the chief instrument, has issued not less than 212,000 volumes of the divine word in forty different languages, embracing the vernacular tongues of 270,000,000 of human beings; besides the circulation of above seventy tracts, translated by the Serampore missionaries into nine different languages; the publication of a Bengalee newspaper, which has taken a powerful and most beneficial hold of the minds of the natives; and a great many other works, interesting alike to the oriental scholar, and to the friends of Christian missions.

In prospect of his approaching end, the good man often said to his beloved friends around him, when anxiously inquiring the state of his mind, in the prospect of this event, "I have no raptures, but I have no fears; for the cross and atonement of Christ are my all-sufficient ground of hope and joy."

He died June 9, 1834, full of years, and honor, and happiness. His last articulated breath was that of fervent praise and prayer. A well-written history of his life would include the whole history of modern benevolent enterprise.—Ryland's Life of Fuller; Sumner's Durpan of Calcutta; Boston Recorder; S. S. Journal.

CHAMPOLLION (JOHN FRANCIS) celebrated for his works on the hieroglyphics and antiquities of Egypt. He was born at Grenoble, December, 1790. While professor of history in Grenoble, he devoted much attention to Egyptian antiquities, and in 1826 was appointed to a department in the Egyptian museum at Paris, where he found collections. In 1828, he visited Egypt itself, in connexion with other learned men, and the result of his inquiries has thrown light upon a mystery which had been hid for ages. The ancient history of the Bible receives new confirmation by these interesting discoveries. Champollion died at Paris, March 4, 1832, and his Egyptian manuscripts were purchased by the government for 50,000 francs.—Am. Almanac.

CHATEAUBRIAND (FRANCIS ARISTIDES, VISCOUNT DE) was born in 1769, of an ancient family in Brittany. He entered into the military service in 1793, but his regiment revolting at the beginning of the revolution, he came to America and spent some time among the Indians of the western wilderness, studying the character of that people and viewing the beauties of nature in their original state. He returned to Europe in 1792, and from a sense of duty enlisted under the banner of the French republic. In their service he was severely wounded and confined to his bed for three years; this ruined his finances and compelled him to resort to his pen for support. He published his Essay on Ancient and Modern Revolutions, and afterwards his Genius of Christianity, works which have been much read and admired. Napoleon wished to attach him to his interests, and for a short time succeeded; but on the death of the duke of Enghien he was restored to his employments. He then travelled in Italy, Greece, and the Holy Land; and has since published his travels in those countries. During the residue of the reign of Napoleon, he lived a private life; but on the restoration of the Bourbons he was created a viscount, and named minister to Sweden. He was afterwards minister to Berlin, president of the electoral college of the department of Loire, and minister of the interior of France.

CHRISTIAN (JOSEPH S.) pastor of the American Presbyterian church, Montreal, Lower Canada. This interesting and accomplished young minister was born in Getztown, Beaver county, Pennsylvania, April 10, 1803. He was the eighth of thirteen children. From his earliest years he displayed an extraordinary versatility and ardor of mind, and a restless spirit of inquiry. Before he was eight years of age he had a room appropriated to himself, where he practised drawing maps and institutions, for which he had both a talent and passion. In like manner he pursued poetry—he analyzed it, studied its history, principles, and relations, and then practised it. His principal poem, "The Artist," in two cantos, published at the age of sixteen, is a beautiful evidence of his rare qualities and powers in the departments. He graduated at Washington college in 1819, the first scholar in his class, though but sixteen years of age. During the senior year he had felt the power of religion in his heart, and after spending some time, according to the wish of his father, in the study of medicine, such was his sense of the value of salvation to sinners, that he was constrained to forego every earthly prospect for the self-denying labors of the Christian ministry. He entered Princeton Theological Seminary in 1821, and after three years' diligent study, received license from the presbytery of Philadelphia. He offered himself as a missionary to France, April, 1824; but before any arrangements could be made for that object, he was urged to go to Montreal, Lower Canada, as pastor of the newly-formed American Presbyterian church. He at length consented; was ordained by the presbytery of New York; and labored most faithfully and successfully at Montreal for four years; when his delicate health gave way under the severity of the climate, and he was compelled to resign his beloved charge. This was a sore trial. God had blessed his labors, so that the church had increased from 20 to 150 members, most of them the souls of his ministry. In 1828 he returned with his family to the city of New York, where he spent some months with his wife's father, Mr. Perez Jones. In January, 1829, he sailed for New Orleans as agent of the American Bible society, but his health proving inadequate, he came back in March. From April to August of that year he was called to part with his wife and two infant children. His Christian principles sustained him, with an energy truly divine, and under these afflictions he still assiduously employed himself in doing good to the utmost of his power; and finding his health improved, he accepted the call of the Bowers Presbyterian church in October of the same year. In the midst of his rapidly rising usefulness he was suddenly removed by a short illness, March 14, 1830, in his twenty-seventh year. His death was a scene of calm and holy triumph. "I commend my soul," he observed, "to the Lord Jesus Christ, who will treat and save and comfort and direct my soul, and who I doubt not has received to himself also my two children, when I now expect soon to meet in glory."

Mr. Christmas was the author of the Report of the Montreal Bible Society, 1825; Tracts No. 183 and 252 of the American Tract Society; an Appeal to the Inhabitants of Lower Canada on the Disease of Aged Spirits; Address to Physicians; Appeal to Grocers; a Discourse on the Necessity of that Faculty which prevents the Spirit from embracing the Gospel; and a Farewell Letter to the American Presbyterian Society of Montreal. The two last pieces are of incomparable excellence.—See the Memoir of his Life, by Mr. Lord.

CLARKSON, (THOMAS,) a distinguished English philanthropist, was born in the year 1751, and educated at Cambridge, where he had a high reputation. In 1781, Mr. Clarkson composed a prize essay in Latin, on the great question, "Is it just to enslave the African?" a translation of which he afterwards published. This was probably the first effectual step toward the suppression of the African slave-trade, and seems to have stimulated its author to those great exertions, which so materially contributed to the English act of abolition. From this time Mr. Clarkson relinquished his professional pursuits and devoted his whole time to this great object. He connected himself with Mr. Wilberforce and others, and formed a society for the abolition of the African slave-trade; he also wrote and published several works on the subject, had several interviews with Mr. Pitt and the privy council, and after years of unwearied exertion has accomplished the great object he had in view. He has lived to witness the triumph of principle and humanity, and to see his name placed among the benefactors of the human race.—Gen. Hist. Diss.

COBB, (NATHANIEL R.) a Christian merchant and philanthropist, of Boston, Massachusetts, was born in Falmouth, (now Westbrook,) Maine, November 3, 1793. His father died when he was very young, and in March, 1802, he removed with his mother to Plymouth, (Mass.) In 1814, he became a clerk to Messrs. Ripley and Freeman, Boston. Here his mind was drawn to God through Christ, and in May, 1818, he was baptized by the Rev. Mr. Sharp, and united with the Baptist church under his care. In February, 1819, he commenced business, in company with Mr. G. L. Freeman, in which he continued till his death, May 22, 1834, in the thirty-sixth year of his age. In him, men of all classes revered the power and worth of undefiled religion.

Mr. Cobb resolved at the commencement of his religious life, that he would serve the Savior with all his energies in that sphere which was assigned him. He accordingly, in November, 1821, drew up and signed the following remarkable document:

"By the grace of God, I will never be worth more than $50,000. By the grace of God, I will give one-fourth of the nett profits of my business to charitable and religious uses; if I am ever worth $20,000, I will give one-half of my nett profits; and if I am ever worth $30,000, I will give three-fourths; and the whole after $50,000. So help me God, or give to a more faithful steward, and set me aside.

To this covenant he adhered with conscientious fidelity. God so prospered him that before his death he gave away more than $40,000. Here is the secret of that wonderful liberality which cheered so many hearts, and gave vigor to so many institutions and plans of benevolence. He lived on earth in the very spirit of heaven. No wonder that such a man should say in his last moments, "It is indeed a glorious thing to die." Nothing can equal my enjoyment in the near view of heaven. My hope in Christ is worth infinitely more than all other things."—Am. Bib. Mag., August, 1834.

COLERIDGE, (SAMUEL TAYLOR.) This eminent English philosopher and poet was born in 1773, at Ottery, St. Marys, in Devonshire, and educated at Cambridge. He was early distinguished by his uncommon talents and eccentricities, and he appears to have three friends in connection by youthful liberality, for which in the latter part of his life he suffered severely. On leaving the university he was enthusiastic in the cause of freedom and philanthropy, and together with Southey and Robert Lovell formed a plan for a new settlement in America, where it was proposed by means of a system called parishocracy to rectify the evils of Europe. These schemes of political regeneration were given up on the marriage of the three friends to three sisters, at Bristol, in 1795. In 1797 he resided at Nether Stowey, enjoying the society of Wordsworth, engaged in literary pursuits, and on the Sabbath supplying the Unitarian chapel at Taunton. In 1798 a pension of 100 pounds per annum, the gift of Thomas Wedgwood, Esq.

enabled him to visit Germany, and prosecute his studies under Eichhorn, Blumenbach, &c. at the university of Göttingen. On his return to England he went to reside at Keswick, in Cumberland, enriched with ample stores of both speculative and useful knowledge. Here he experienced what he calls a "re-conversion" to the Trinitarian faith; which he had formerly abandoned. He still continued to write on politics, but with less success than in poetry, his mind being too profound and abstract for a popular leader. Some years after he went to Malta; spent some time in the service of the governor as secretary; and he was afterwards employed as an agent visiting Italy, and exploring its literary treasures, returning again to England, where he resided chiefly at Hampstead and Highgate, London, until his death, July 26, 1834, aged sixty-one. His latter years of pain were soothed by the sublime consolations of the gospel of Christ.

We regret that we cannot here discuss his qualities or his exertions as a psychologist, moralist, and general philosopher; but we cannot close this sketch without adverting to an account of his last illness, in which, whatever might have been the bias of his mind or the character of his pursuits in earlier years, he shows the true spirit of a philosopher, and the hopes and triumphs of a Christian. "His worldly affairs had been long settled, and after many tender adieus, he expressed a wish that he might be as little interrupted as possible. His sufferings were severe and constant till within thirty-six hours of his end; but they had no power to enfeeble another pension; and after visiting Italy, and exploring its literary treasures, returning again to England, where he resided chiefly at Hampstead and Highgate, London, until his death, July 26, 1834, aged sixty-one. His latter years of pain were soothed by the sublime consolations of the gospel of Christ."

Mr. Coleridge wrote about a month before his death his own humble and affectionate epitaph:

Stop, Christian passer-by! Stop, child of God,
And read with gentle heart. Beneath this sod
A poor life led, or that which once seemed so—
O, lift a thought in prayer for S. T. C.
That he who many a year with toil of breath
Found death in life, may now find life in death!
Mercy for praise—to be forgiven for fame,
He asked and hoped through Christ.—Do thou the same!

Besides his Poems, his Biographia Literaria, and contributions to various literary works, he has published the Friend, Aids to Reflection, and Statesman's Manual; works which display genius of the highest order devoted to the service of Christianity.—London Quaker Rev.; West's Mag.; Memoir prefixed to his Works; Table Talk of a Friend.

COLTON, (CHARLES CALLE,) author of "Lacon," was graduated at King's college, Cambridge, in 1801; was chosen a fellow; took orders; and in 1818 obtained the vicarage of Kew and Petersham. He possessed great talents, profound philosophical acumen, polished taste, and brilliant wit; but his eccentricities and irregularities were equally great, and uncontrolled by the principles either of prudence or piety. His life was so full of folly as his writings of wisdom, and he might be said to have exemplified his own sarcastic observation, that there are persons who give away so much wisdom they seem to have none left for their own use, or the yet more important observation of John Foster, that "the efficacy of truth itself, depends entirely upon the communion of the soul with the God of truth." His inveterate attachment to gambling reduced him to beggary, and his excesses brought on a disease which rendered a surgical operation, to avoid the pain of which he blew out his brains! This tragical event took place at Fontainebleau, in France, April 28, 1832. It is a tragedy, however, not without a moral in the eye of a truly Christian philosophy, and ages may revolve before a more striking example shall be presented to the world, of the necessity of not only perceiving truth with clearness and precision, but of obeying it cordially, through the power of the Holy Spirit, which rendered so fatal above, in the name of Christ. His principal works are, "Hypocrisy, a Poem," and "Lacon, or Many Things in a Few Words, addressed to those who think,"—a work of its class almost unrivalled in popularity. It first appeared near the close of 1820, and in the course of a year had passed through six editions, and is still in high repute not only for its brilliant wit and pointed brevity, but for its sound philosophy and extensive knowledge of the world.—Am. Almanac.

COMMENTARY. Our volume would be far behind the times should it go forth without a notice of a work under this head, of rare excellence, and on a plan at once novel and judicious.

The Comprehensive Commentary on the Holy Bible, containing the text according to the authorized version; Scott's marginal references; Matthew Henry's Commentary, condensed, but retaining every useful thought; the principal observations, in the name of Christ, D.; with extensive explanatory, critical, and philological notes, selected from Scott, Doddridge, Gill, Adam Clarke, Patrick, Poole, Lowth, Burder, Harmer, Calmet, Rosenmueller, Bloomfield, Stuart, Dush, Dwight, and many other writers on the Scriptures. The whole designed to be a digest and combination of the advantages of the best Bible commentaries, and embracing nearly all that is valuable in Henry, Scott, and Doddridge; conveniently arranged for family and private reading, and at the same time particularly adapted to the wants of Sabbath school teachers and Bible classes; with numerous useful tables, and a neatly engraved family record. Edited by Rev. William Jenks, D. D., pastor of Green-street church, Boston. Embellished with five portraits, and other elegant engravings, from steel plates; several maps, and many wood cuts, together with a large quantity of other matter, explanatory and illustrative of the Scriptures, for other sources.

The following extract from the advertisement prefixed to the first published volume explains the plan and design of the work.

1. To combine, as far as possible, in one work of reasonable and convenient compass, and at a price to bring it within the reach of all, the peculiar excellencies and advantages of Henry's, Scott's, and Doddridge's commentaries, (consequently the most popular and useful in the language,) together with a large quantity of other matter, explanatory and illustrative of the Scriptures, for other sources.

2. To present the whole, thus collected and combined, in a form at once attractive and convenient for family use and private reading, with special reference also to the wants of Sabbath schools and Bible classes.

3. In the selections, the aim has been throughout, on the one hand, to be as full as possible, drawing largely from the rich sources opened by a range of as many as a hundred authors; and, on the other hand, to guard against tediousness and repulsiveness, by too great minuteness. The design has been to draw out the best parts of the best writers, with a strict watchfulness that every part should be evangelized, plain, familiar, and applicatory, and adapted to the exigencies of our country and the times, and suited to the wants of the great body of the people. To this end all words in foreign languages are omitted in the critical notes and quotations.

Each of the leading commentaries forming the main body of this work has its peculiar advantages, and its friends and admirers; and each, with a strict watchfulness, that every part should be evangelized, plain, familiar, and applicatory, and adapted to the exigencies of our country and the times, and suited to the wants of the great body of the people. To this end all words in foreign languages are omitted in the critical notes and quotations.

Each of the leading commentaries forming the main body of this work has its peculiar advantages, and its friends and admirers; and each, with a strict watchfulness, that every part should be evangelized, plain, familiar, and applicatory, and adapted to the exigencies of our country and the times, and suited to the wants of the great body of the people. To this end all words in foreign languages are omitted in the critical notes and quotations.

It is therefore believed that this work offers to the reader more advantages than the possession of the works of Henry, Scott, and Doddridge themselves would, even could they altogether be procured at the same expense; as he saved the trouble of turning over and searching for a passage in three different works, and finding much of the same matter in all, besides having the additional views of many other esteemed writers. In the abridgment of Henry, great care has been used so that his most jealous friends should not be offended by any liberties taken; and it is confidently believed it will be found much more pleasant reading in this form than in the original.

On the doctrines, it may confidently be asserted that Henry, Scott, and Doddridge, speak their own opinions unadulterated and entire. Where any thing has been omitted from Scott, it was because it is anticipated in the remarks of Henry.

↳ At the suggestion of some members of the Baptist denomination, an edition of this work has been published, prepared by Rev. Joseph A. Warne, A. M., pastor of the Baptist church in Brookline, differing in no respect from the other, except that on the subject of baptism it has been conformed to the Baptist views. The following extract from the preface to this edition sufficiently shows the principles on which it has been executed.

"What was promised in the Baptist edition, as such, was that whatever was found in the work, as published for Pledobaptists, which did not correspond with the views of the Baptists, should be removed; and the maturest views of their own best writers substituted. In the endeavor to fulfil these engagements, the whole of the matter has been carefully read, every objectionable portion he has endeavored to remove; and no exertion has been spared to furnish the thoughts of the best writers, to supply the deficiencies occasioned by erasure. The editor has availed himself of the labors of Gill, Carson, Ripley, and others. It is confidently believed that no point connected with what is peculiar to the Baptist denomination has been left unguarded; and when it is considered that on no points but those, do Baptists differ from Henry, Scott, Doddridge, &c. there can be scarcely a doubt but that the denomination in general will feel, (if the work of the editor has been faithfully performed,) that they have now a commentary, in the reading of which they are sure to find what will fan the flame of love, and satisfy the appetite for truth, and this without that diminution of their enjoyment, with which they were accustomed to meet, in reading the same authors, arising from their mistaken views, as they believe, of a Christian ordinance in its mode and subjects."

DEFOE, (DANIEL), the author of Robinson Crusoe, was the son of a butcher, and was born in London, in 1661. He was brought up for the dissenting ministry, but did not complete his clerical education. In 1685, he joined in Monmouth's rebellion, yet was fortunate enough to escape the fatal consequences. Previously to that event he had prelated as an author by publishing a satirical pamphlet, called Speculum Craepeworwur, and a Treatise against the Turks. Having secured his head, he entered into business, as a hatter, and also as a tile manufacturer, but he was not successful. His pen still continued to be active. To enumerate here even a hundredth part of his literary labors would be impracticable, as a mere catalogue of them occupies sixteen pages. Among the most prominent of his various efforts may be placed his Trueborn Englishman, a satire, published in 1701. In rugged metre, but often with forcible thoughts and language, it reprehends the intemperance which was manifested towards his political idol, William III. In 1702, when the high church party was displaying its persecuting spirit, Defoe brought out his admirable ironical pamphlet, the Shortest Way, with the Dissenters. The house of commons sent it a seditious libel, and a court of justice, or rather of injustice, sentenced him to be fined, imprisoned, and pilloried. To the last of these inflictions Pope has alluded in a line which disgraces only its author. Defoe, feeling that it is crime and not the scaffold that makes shame, poured forth his feelings in a high spirited Hymn to the Pillory. While Each edition has its distinctive character, and no compromise of views has been aimed at. On this point we quote the preface again.

"The editor may be permitted to say, that he cordially believes the pledge of the publishers, in their prospectus, has been fully redeemed; viz: that the Baptist denomination should have a commentary placed within their reach, in which, on their own denominational peculiarities, they should find nothing against which they could reasonably object. The editor takes pleasure in thus publicly saying, that in no single instance have the publishers objected to make the alterations he suggested; and so far have they been from desiring that any compromise should be made, that plates for some pages have been cast, where the alterations have not extended to more than two or three words, and paid for, in order, to insure that one. It was, indeed, to avoid almost the possibility of compromise, that two editions of the work were printed. Had the compromise of any of our peculiarities been contemplated, it could not have been secured except at the cost of similar compromise on the part of those who differ from us. This course would have made the two editors joint ones; and such a junction, by awakening the jealousies of both Baptists and Pledobaptists, would have rendered the work unwelcome to both; and thus have defeated the object of the publishers, and involved them in loss and disappointment."

This work has received the highest testimonials of its excellence from a large number of the most competent critics in our land, and it is undoubtedly the best commentary on the whole Bible in the language, not only for the Sabbath school teacher and family, but also for the student and minister of the gospel. The following judicious remarks are contained in the Theological Review, New York, edited by E. V. Leonard Woods, Jr., July, 1834.

"While the standard commentaries in our language certainly have great excellencies, they also have glaring defects, and it was a good thought to form a commentary which should combine the excellencies and exclude the defects of our most approved interpreters of the Bible. Such is the object of the Comprehensive Commentary. The task was a difficult one, and was accomplished with no little labor and strange. But it has been accomplished thus far, under the auspices of the learned and able editor, in such a way as to realize the expectations of the public. We have no doubt that the best and only way of promoting a thorough knowledge of the Scriptures, is for writers to devote themselves to the more careful study of particular books. The whole Bible is too large a field to be successfully cultivated by a single hand; hence we think the labors of professors Stuart, Robinson, Burdett, and others, are far more wisely directed in being employed on particular portions of the sacred word, than in being extended, like those of some others, over the whole Bible.

"This opinion, however, does not diminish our appreciation of the attempt to render the riches of scripture knowledge and particular instruction already existing in the language, more available by the great mass of the community. The one is an effort to elevate the standard of Biblical learning, the other to disseminate the knowledge already accumulated; and for the latter object no work on the Scriptures which we have seen is better calculated than the Comprehensive Commentary."

Notes on Genesis, Exodus, and Leviticus, by Rev. George Dorr, professor in university of New York, and notes on the New Testament by Rev. Albert Barnes, of Philadelphia, ought also to be added to the books mentioned in the body of this work under this head. For other works on the Bible, with notices of their character, see Horne's Introduction, Orme's Bibliotheca Biblica, and Bickersteth's Christian Student.

CORNELIUS, (ELIAS, D. D.) (See CORNELIUS, ELIAS.) A memoir of this excellent man, by Mr. B. Edwards, was published in 1824.

CUVIER, (Baron de.) was born at Montbelliard in 1769, and educated at Stuttgart, where he became acquainted with the language, the literature, and the sciences of Germany. He arrived in France at the beginning of the revolution, and was soon distinguished among scientific men. He was one of the first members of the French Institute, and perpetual secretary of the academy of Physical Science, and professor of natural history to the college of France. Baron Cuvier was the most distinguished naturalist of the present age, and to profound knowledge he added the art of expressing his ideas with great elegance and perspicuity. His writings are very numerous on scientific and miscellaneous subjects. His great work on the Animal Kingdom is best known. He was one of the editors of the Journal des Savants. He died in 1833, in the possession of the Protestant faith, aged sixty-three.—Ann. Annapac; Select Journal.

he was in confinement, he commenced the Review, a periodical which probably gave rise to the Tatler. At the end of two years he was released by Harley, and was employed on several confidential missions particularly in contributing to effect the union with Scotland. Of the union he afterwards published an excellent history. Towards the end of the reign of Anne he was again imprisoned for a work similar to the Shortest Way, and was again extricated by Harley. On the accession of George I. Defoe was in a manner proscribed by that very whig party of which he had been one of the most strenuous and able supporters. Disgusted with politics, he turned his genius to other subjects. The first result of his labor was the Family Instructor. In 1713, he produced the immitable Robinson Crusoe, which speedily became popular, and must ever remain so. It was succeeded by a crowd of other performances, among which stand prominent the Adventures of a Cavalier, a Journal of the Plague in 1665, the Political History of the Devil, and a System of Magic. It is a melancholy circumstance, that, in spite of his talents and industry, the latter days of Defoe were darkened not only by the misconduct of a son, but by the evil attendance on penury. He died, insolvent, in the parish of Cripplegate, in April, 1731. He has been correctly described as "a man of the strongest natural powers, a lively imagination, and solid judgment, joined with an unshaken probity in his moral conduct, and an invincible integrity in his political sphere." In a word, Defoe was a Christian.—Dorr.

DE LAUNE, (THOMAS), the champion martyr of English non-conformity, author of the celebrated "Plea for the Non-conformists," was a native of Ireland, and flourished in the latter part of the seventeenth century. This excellent man was the teacher of a grammar-school, and minister of a Baptist congregation in London, though silenced in the preface and introduction, of the "Plea," in consequence of the publication of a discourse by Dr. Benjamin Colman, a clergyman of the established church, entitled "Scrupleous Consciences," in which he challenged the non-conformists to a fair and honorable discussion of the points at issue. Mr. De Laune thought it his duty to meet the challenge. This he did in his immortal "Plea," a work which was never answered, though it passed through twenty editions, and of which Defoe, who wrote a preface to the eighth edition, says, "The book is perfect, and the never author left behind him a more finished piece; and I believe the dispute is entirely ended. If any man ask what we can say why the Dissenters differ from the church of England, and what they can plead for it, I can recommend no better reply than this; let them answer in short, Thomas De Laune, and desire the querist to read the book." Yet for this publication, the author, in 1683, was thrown into Newgate, and there, with his wife and two small children, died, after languishing for fifteen months, in close and cruel confinement. His behavior, both at his trial, and through all his sufferings afterwards, displayed true greatness of mind, and did honor to his Christian principles. His meekness and patience were invincible; though, as Defoe remarks, "such a man as this, in a case where few greater scholars, cleverer heads, or greater masters of argument ever graced the English nation, are sorry to say he is one of near 8000 Protestant dissenters that perished in prison in the days of that merciful prince, king Charles II."—See De Laune's Plea, Ballston (N. Y.) edition, 1800.

EDGEWORTH, (MARIA), is the daughter of Richard Lovell Edgeworth, Esq., of Edgeworthstown, Ireland, a gentleman distinguished in the literary world for his talents and writings. The daughter is said to excel her parents in talents; she has devoted herself to literary pursuits with zeal and ardor. One of her objects has been to perfect the system of female education, in which part she has succeeded. As a novel writer she ranks among the most eminent, and the Irish character has never been drawn with equal truth and spirit by any other writer. Her publications, which are numerous, have been well received on both sides of the Atlantic. Yet they are paraded by one radical defect—the total absence of religious principle and motive. Her morality is altogether that of the world.—Gen. Biog. Diet.

EMERSON, (JOSEPH), minister in Beverly, Massachusetts, and the morning star of improved female education in New England, was born at Hollis, New Hampshire, October 13, 1777. From infancy his health was extremely delicate, but was somewhat improved by the care taken of his physical education. He fitted for college at the New Ipswich academy, and entered Cambridge in 1794. While at Hollis in the vacation of his third college year, he became the subject of divine grace, and united with the Congregational church in that town. He was graduated at Cambridge in 1798, in the same class with Story and Channing, and took charge of the academy in Framingham. Having declined an offer of the Christian ministry, he spent the next two years with the Rev. Dr. Emmons at Cambridge. In 1801, he accepted the office of tutor at Cambridge. Having received license he preached to many churches in the vicinity, and in 1803 was ordained pastor of the third Congregational church in Beverly, then newly formed. In 1804, he lost his first wife. He married a second time in 1805, but was again bereaved in 1808. He married his third wife, Miss Rebecca Hasseltine, (a sister of Mrs. Johnson,) in 1810. His health, always feeble, amidst his tireless and devoted labors for the good of his people, at length became so entirely prostrated, that in 1816, he was compelled to resign his pastoral charge, to their great mutual affliction. The same year he sailed to Charleston, South Carolina, for his health. He here completed and delivered a course of lectures on astronomy, and another on the millennium. On his return, in 1819, he opened a seminary for teachers in Beverly, Mass.

Here begins a new and important era in his life. From this time he devoted himself with systematic zeal to the improvement of female education, and his success was in proportion to his zeal. Perhaps no other man in New England has exerted so wide and salutary an influence. In 1821, he removed his seminary to Saugus, that he might be able at the same time to supply a destitute people with the preaching of the gospel, as far as his health would allow. Here he soon had one hundred and twenty-two pupils. In 1823, his health again sank under his labors, and he again went to the south. On his return in 1824, he was induced to remove his seminary from Saugus to Wethersfield, Connecticut. Here, with some interruptions, he conducted it with great and growing success until 1839, when he again spent the winter at the south. On his return in 1831, he still found his health feeble, but he continued his zealous efforts to do good, even after he became unable to discharge the duties of a preacher or professor, by conducting lectures in various places, till February 7, 1833; and when on his sick bed, by prayer, conversation, and the dictation of letters to his friends. He closed his useful course, May 13, 1833, in his fifty-fifth year. His last days, like those of Payson and Henry, were full of heavenly glory, though his exulting anticipations of the approaching millennium were such that he remarked on one occasion, "I should like to close my eyes in death, and sink in glory; but I should rather live. I want to do something for the millennium. It is deepest in my heart." Indeed this subject from an early period was his sole in every affliction, and seemed to irradiate every science, every place, and every duty. "It is one of the most astonishing things in the world," he observed, "that Christians should think so little about it. It seems as if their eyes were hidden."

FRANKLIN, (BENJAMIN, LL. D.), the American sage, philosopher, and statesman, was born in Boston in 1706, and began his career as a printer. Scarcely emerged from infancy Franklin was a philosopher without being conscious of it, and by the continual exercise of his genius prepared himself for those great discoveries in science which have since associated his name with that of Newton, and for those phi-

EPISCOPALIANS. (See PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH.)

ERSKINE, (THOMAS, LORD), the third son of the late earl of Buchan, was born in Scotland, in 1750. After completing his education under the care of one of the most accomplished scholars of Scotland, he entered the navy, which he soon exchanged for the army, in which he served several years. The demands of an increasing family, and the scantiness of his income as an officer, induced him to make choice of a profession, and in 1777, he commenced his legal studies. The next year he was called to the bar. Here he soon had an opportunity of displaying his transcendent talents, and his first effort was considered a master-piece of forensic eloquence. From that moment his success was certain, and his subsequent exertions have only realized the expectations formed by those who then heard him. As an eloquent and accomplished advocate he unquestionably stood first at the English bar. Lord Erskine became a member of the house of commons in 1783, was elected a peer in 1800, and raised to the dignity of lord high chancellor of the realm, which office he resigned on his friends going out of administration. He was a firm believer in Christianity.—See report.

EWALD, (Professor), a distinguished German philologist of the present age, is the son of a poor weaver in Göttingen. He was born in 1802. When very young he manifested so remarkable a taste for literary pursuits that some distinguished patrons of learning gave him pecuniary assistance, that he might enter the university of his native city. Here his rare talents attracted the attention of many of the professors, who, in order to aid him, made him private teacher in their families. Perhaps no individual had so great an influence upon his literary character as Eichhorn, then professor of oriental literature at Göttingen. This great scholar observing in the mind of the young aspirant indubitable tokens of future greatness, bestowed upon him special attention, and even gave him gratuitous private lessons. At the age of twenty he obtained a university course and a doctor's degree at Göttingen, at Wolfenbuttel, but in the following year by Eichhorn's influence was appointed repetent at Göttingen. This office in rank nearly corresponds to that of tutor in our colleges, though, as the name itself implies, its appropriate duties are to repeat or conduct the review of the lectures of other professors. At the age of twenty-four he published his great work, the "Critical Hebrew Grammar," upon which he was appointed professor extraordinary. Such were his merits and success as a teacher, that upon the death of Eichhorn it was thought unnecessary to appoint a successor. Nothing could be more favorable for the development of his mind or for his reputation than this occurrence, which threw upon his hands the students, and virtually introduced him into the place of Eichhorn. He obtained this distinguished station exactly at the moment when he was ripe for it. In 1833, he was appointed ordinary professor, which station he now fills with an honor that happens to few. His profound philological science is by no means limited to the Hebrew language; he is perhaps equally well versed in the other Semitic dialects, and even Sanscrit literature is subject to his critical eye. In short he is an orientalist in the wide sense of the term. It is said that in Arabic grammar he has plucked nearly as many laurels from Freytag as he has in Hebrew from Gesenius. Both of his larger and smaller Hebrew grammars a new edition is already called for, though Gesenius' larger work has gone through only one edition. Ewald is now preparing a brief commentary on the whole of the Old Testament. Whether Moses and the prophets will remain in their simple and sublime Hebrew character, or come forth in the mask of the Hegelian philosophy, is yet to be learned.—New York Baptist Register.

litical reflections which have placed him by the side of a Solon and a Lycurgus. The perusal of Cotton Mather's Essays to do Good, which himself tells us, determined him to aim at being a benefactor of his race, and directed his views in all his pursuits to public utility. The progress of his public life, and the part which he took in securing the independence of his country, are too familiarly known to need recapituation here; but the nature and formation of his religious opinions are of some importance, and especially as some have been disposed to regard him as a disbeliever in Christianity. The truth is, as he himself tells us in his autobiography, that he early became so disgusted with religious polemics, and dissatisfied with the abstract arguments of Dr. Clarke and others, that he fell into infidel opinions, and took some pains for a time, while working at his trade in London, to spread them; but even then he saw so much of their demoralizing influence that he became heartily sick of them, and of the converts had gained. His letter to Thomas Paine, dissenting him from publishing his "Age of Reason," is highly characteristic. In subsequent life, though much in the society of the atheistical savans of France, he never took part with their views, but as his judgment ripened, and his acquaintance with the Scriptures increased, he became fully satisfied of their excellence and divine authority. His constant habits of secret prayer, and his firm dependence on Divine Providence, are known to all those acquainted with his writings. He died April 17, 1790, expressing his Christian faith in the well known epitaph, which he composed and ordered to be inscribed upon his tomb.

GAMBIER, (JAMES, Admiral, York), a distinguished officer in the British navy, and president of the Church Missionary Society, was born in 1736, and died in 1833. His grandmother was a French refugee. Lord Gambier was commander of the fleet which took possession of the Danish navy in 1807. He was characterized by great piety and benevolence, and was the cordial friend and promoter of the great Christian charities of the age.—Am. Almanac.

GIESELER, (Professor), a very distinguished writer of church history, was born 1794, in Germany. He commenced his academical studies in the orphan house at Halle, whence he entered the university at the same place, and formed his literary character under the instructions of Knapp, Gesenius, and Wegecheider. At the age of twenty-five, he was corrector, or assistant superintendent of the gymnasium of Minden, his native place, and at the end of two years was chosen rector of another gymnasium; but before entering upon his duties he was appointed professor of theology in the new university at Bonn. Here he continued eleven years, and by his uncommon industry and intellectual vigor earned a reputation, which in 1831 brought him to Gottingen as professor of ecclesiastical history. He is now in the very meridian of life, being forty-two years old. Gieseleser has not confined himself to the period of the early church, but his last volume, now in press, reaches to the time of the Reformation. As he is a rationalist it cannot be said of him in any evangelical sense that he demonstrates truth in the midst of error.

But he has made the best amends that could be made. In his very copious notes he has collected and condensed, with mastery skill and accuracy, the testimony of original witnesses, so that the reader may form his own judgment on each topic. In this respect he has a decided advantage over Neander, who presents merely the results to which his investigations have led. The two works, written on a plan so different, mutually supply each other's deficiencies, and both are indispensable to the student of church history. In learning and talent Gieseleser seems to be not much inferior to Neander, but embracing as he has a longer period, it was impossible that he should exhaust the subject as his rival has done. As a rationalist, he cannot, like Neander, live in the spirit of Christianity, and point out its development in every step of history. But though he exhibits the church and the men who have lived in it more in their external relations, and in the light of error and criticism, he renders his work unrivalled in accuracy of detail. Though Neander's history embraces the first five or six centuries only, and Gieseleser's extends into the sixteenth, the works themselves are nearly of the same extent. These two are unquestionably the standard authors on church history.—New York Baptist Register.

GERMAN REFORMED CHURCH. (See REFORMED GERMAN CHURCH.)

GODWIN (WILLIAM), son of a dissenting clergyman, was himself a preacher of that persuasion for some years. In 1792, as the author of "Political Justice," he incalculated some doctrines both on religion and politics which gave great offence. He has since been a political and miscellaneous writer, and has acquired much celebrity by his masterly examination of "Malthus on Population," "Fleetwood," "Mauleville," "Life and Age of Geoffry Chaucer," and "Caleb Williams," are also from his pen. Besides these he has written many useful books on education, and is now a juvenile bookseller in London.—Gen. Biog.

GREEN, (SAMUEL), pastor of the Union Congregational Church, Essex street, Boston. He was born in 1792, at Stoneham, Middlesex county, Massachusetts. In a neighboring town, he learned the trade of a bricklayer. By his own exertions, he prepared himself for Phillips academy, Andover, where he remained two years. He then entered Harvard college. His scholarship was superior, particularly in mathematical and metaphysical studies. In his junior year, his health failed, and he was obliged to leave the college. He received his first degree a year after the usual time, 1817. He then spent one year, though with feeble health, at the Theological seminary, Andover. He completed his theological studies in the course of president Appleton, of Bowdoin college; at the same time performing the office of tutor in that institution.

In 1820, Mr. Green was obtained pastor of a Congregational church in Reading, Massachusetts. After three years' labor, he received a dismission, and was installed the first pastor of the Union church, Essex street, Boston. Here he remained till the spring of 1831, when in consequence of multiplied exertions in an interesting revival of religion, he was attacked with an organic affection of the throat, from which he never recovered so as to be able to resume his ministerial duties. In October, 1831, he was attacked with a severe pleurisy fever, which gradually brought him down to the grave. Through the whole of his illness, he had the use of his reason, and frequently expressed entire resignation to the will of God. At times he was favored with delightful visions of the glories of the heavenly world. He said he was a poor and miserable sinner, and his only hope of salvation was in the atonement and righteousness of the Lord Jesus Christ. He died November 20, 1831.

Mr. Green's mental powers and acquisitions were much above the ordinary cast, but the great secret of his success was, that, like Enoch, he lived and walked with God. His public prayers were frequently in the highest degree impressive and even sublime. As a pastor, he was a model for faithfulness, warm sympathy, and success. During his ministry four hundred persons were added to the Union church.—Boston Recorder; Christian Watchman.

GRIMKE, (THOMAS SMITH), a Christian lawyer, statesman, patriot, scholar, and orator, was a native of South Carolina. He was born at Charleston, South Carolina, on the 26th of September, 1783. He was descended by his paternal grandmother from one of the French Huguenots, who quitted France in consequence of the edict of Nantz, in 1685. His talents in youth were rather solid than brilliant; but he was always remarkable for his industry and wonderfully retentive memory. He graduated at Yale in 1807. He became one of the first classical scholars in this country, a qualification which he valued but very little in maturer age. His principal traits of character were piety, benevolence, and independence of mind. He embraced the principles of peace as soon as they were presented to his mind. He was a great contributor both by his purse and his pen to the American Peace society, of which he was an able and distinguished advocate. This excellent man, who for several years past has ranked among the first philanthropists of the country, died suddenly, October, 1834, of the cholera, at Columbus, Ohio, on his way home from Cincinnati, where he had been to deliver a literary address. It has been said, (though it seems rather ill chosen language to apply to a man whose soul was so thoroughly imbued with the spirit of Christian humility,) "The west knows no prouder grave." Mr. Grimke is perhaps the only man in the United States who declined the title of LL. D.; an honor which had been conferred upon him by Yale college. Mr. Grimke was a member of the Presbyterian church, though it appears from his published correspondence he was not satisfied of any scriptural authority for infant baptism. His exertions in favor of the use of the Bible as a primary classic in all literary education, as well as in promotion of the cause of peace, gave him a high place in the esteem of the Christian public. He published addresses on these subjects are treasures of learning, argument, eloquence, and piety.

"In estimating the precise amount of greatness referable to Mr. Grimke's character," says the Rev. Mr. Gilman, "we shall arrive at different results, according to our assumed ideal standard of true greatness. Others may have surpassed him in the power of comprehensive generalization, and of delineating clear and striking truths from ordinary subjects. Others also may have possessed an imagination more bold and profound, and a taste more critically correct. It is remarkable, however, that in all these qualities, the production of his mind, during the very last year of his life, should exhibit a decided advance. Thus at the age of fifty his powers seemed as flexible and improvable as those of a young man; in the same way that his heart continued as enthusiastic and unspiculated as a child's; and there can be no doubt, that had his life been spared, we should have seen him achieving every year new triumphs in the higher departments of intellect. Others again may have surpassed him in the act of moulding and directing the mass of mankind to their immediate purposes. But if general energy and sublimity ought to enter largely into our conceptions of true greatness; if an entire fearlessness of personal consequences, in the prosecution of honorable aims; if such freedom from the ordinary workings of selfishness, as prompted him to part with his thousands, while men of wider means, and fair repute for liberality, could only spare their hundreds; if an elasticity of soul, which was never diminished by disappointment, but meekly acquiesced in the failure of one well-meant project only to start with fresh ardor on another; if such an entire disdain of vulgar popularity, as caused him, the Abiel of his day, to keep

Unshaken, unseduced, unterrified,
His loyalty, his love, his zeal for right,
While number nor example with him wrought
To swerve from truth, or change his constant mind, Though single,—

if these attributes, joined to his admitted literary abilities, the best education of the age, an application which neither knew nor sought recollection, and particularly a power of attention which never lost its freshness and interest, though divided among a multitude of objects; if all these be constituent elements of greatness, then are we justified in placing Mr. Grimke high on the list of the great men, either of our own or of any other country. That the public sentiment respecting him was fast approaching the same conclusion, has been revealed by the universal burst of sorrow, and expressions of admiration and regard, which his death has called forth from every part of the republic. The fact is, in pite of his utter recklessness of immediate popularity, which sometimes seemed reasonable into a want of judgment, and moved even the admiration and regret of his more timid friends, he was rising by a sure and imperceptible under-current to the floodmark of his countrymen's esteem and affection. Had he lived, and had there arisen among the inhabitants of this land an organized struggle (which God in his mercy avert) between the principles of religion and morality on the one hand, and a professed licentious defiance of them on the other, around what centre would the elements of piety, virtue, order, law, human advancement, have more actively revolved and settled; what talisman would all good men have more safely or probably adopted, than the name of Thomas Smith Grimke?<sup>3</sup>—*Chris. HERB; a general name for every species of plants, Gen. 1: 11. Many species are found to have received from the exuberant goodness of the Creator not only nutritive but medicinal qualities, and are of great value in various disorders, to which the human frame in its present state is liable. (See also GRASS, and FEEL.)

HOFFLAND, (Mr. and Mrs.) the former a landscape painter and the latter an author, each uniting considerable talents in their profession. Among the works of Mrs. Hoffland are, "The Son of a Gentleman," "Says she to her Neighbor," "What?" "Ellen the Teacher," "The Sisters," and the "Officers, Clergymen's, and Merchant's Widows." Many of her works are designed for youth, and all are strictly moral.

HUGHES, (JOSEPH, D. D.), originator and secretary of the British and Foreign Bible society. The day of Mr. Hughes' birth we have not ascertained; the year was 1769; the place, London. His father, who, if not a Welshman, was of Welsh extraction, was a member of the Baptist church in Wylde street, over which Dr. Stennett at that time presided. The parents of young Hughes, being in respectable circumstances, gave him the rudiments of a good education. He was taken by them to the house of God, and the grace of God at an early period influenced his heart. Evincing talents for the ministry, and being in other respects fitted to become a candidate for that office, he was received, at a youthful age, into the Baptist academy in Bristol, which was then under the direction and management of Dr. Caleb Evans, assisted by the celebrated Robert Hall. Throughout the whole of the trials and conflicts which Mr. Hall endured at Bristol during that period, Mr. Hughes was his constant and invariable friend. A great cordiality subsisted between them to the end of his life.

Having studied at Bristol for some time, Mr. Hughes proceeded to Edinburgh university, in which he augmented his learning and took the degree of M. A. From the northern capital he returned to Bristol, where his classical attainments procured for him the appointment of tutor in that department, thus succeeding his friend Hall. He continued to act as classical tutor until 1795, when, as Dr. Rippon informs us, the declining state of his health obliged him to leave Bristol.

Soon after, he received a call from the Baptist church at Batterssea, near London, which he accepted, removing thither in the month of July, 1796, and remained there to the end of his protracted and valuable life. He died at his house at Batterssea, on Thursday, October 3, aged sixty-four.

"Few individuals," says the London Christian Guardian, "can be named, who have been more honored as the instrument of extensive usefulness than Mr. Hughes. The Religious Tract society, the British and Foreign Bible society, and the London Hibernian society, were principally, the Bible society indeed almost entirely, the result of his suggestions. His name ought therefore to be had in everlasting remembrance." To the piety, zeal, sound judgment, and unwearied labors of this exemplary servant of God, the Bible Society owes, under the divine blessing, a very large measure of its prosperity. Dr. Hughes was a Dissenter and a Baptist; but he was a man of such Christian moderation and candor, that he never failed to conciliate good men of every name. His Life, by Rev. Mr. Leitchild, is just announced in England.—Am. S. S. Journal.

HUME, (DAVID) the celebrated sceptic and historian, was born in Edinburgh, Scotland, 1711, and in consequence of losing his father at an early age was brought up under the care of his mother, a woman of singular merit. He was destined for the law, but his passion for literature withdrew him from professional studies. He tried commerce with as little success, and in 1734 retired to a small town in France, where he spent three years according to his own inclinations. In 1737, he went to London, where the following year he published his Treatise of Human Nature. The entire neglect which his work experienced gave him severe mortification. In 1742, he printed at Edinburgh his Essays, Moral, Political, and Literary, which were more favorably received. In 1745, he became guardian to the young marquis of Annandale, and the following year was strongly supported as a candidate for the professorship of moral philosophy at Edinburgh, but was negatived by the presbytery on account of his scepticism. He then became secretary to general Sinclair in his military expedition and embassy, and on his return published a revised edition of his Treatise, under the name of an Inquiry concerning the Human Understanding, but with little better success than at first. His Political Discourses in 1752 were better received, but his Inquiry concerning the Principles of Morals, published about the same time, and which he regarded as "his incomparable best work," met with little attention. He now obtained an appointment as librarian to the faculty of advocates in Edinburgh, which seems to have suggested to him a new line of literary labor. He produced his History of England, in five successive volumes, from 1754 to 1761, which gradually won upon the public favor, though wanting in constitutional depth and accuracy, and deeply tinged with avowed Toryism and disguised irreligion. It has been surpassed, however, only by Sir James Mackintosh's recent History of England. From 1767 to 1769, Mr. Hume was under secretary of state. He then finally retired to Edinburgh, where he died, August 25, 1776, aged sixty-four.

Polite, generous, and good humored, Hume was at the same time the most acute and the most absolute of sceptics. His attacks on Christianity are sheer sophisms, which it is not at all probable he believed himself. He enjoyed with a high, though malicious relish, the alarm which they excited in some quarters, as he coveted reputation rather than truth. A sounder philosophy and an abler defence of revealed religion have however arisen out of his attacks, so that Christianity at least has no reason to regret them. IRVING, (EDWARD, M. A.) This eloquent but eccentric preacher, who for the last ten or twelve years has attracted so much attention in England, was born and educated in Scotland. He was first settled as an assistant to Dr. Chalmers at Glasgow, but in 1823 removed to London, and became the minister of a small Scottish chapel in the metropolis. Here his congregation increased in six months from 50 to more than 1000 hearers, among whom were numbers of the greatest men in England, Canning, Brougham, &c. A splendid chapel was erected for him in Hatton Garden, where he preached to immense congregations, with prodigious effect. Here he published his Orations for the Orators of God, and soon he accepted an invitation to come. Other publications followed on the subject of Prophecy, which were thought to give painful indications of aberration of intellect. He professed to believe in the restoration of the gift of tongues, and such strange scenes in consequence often occurred in his congregation, that the trustees at length requested him to resign, and closed the chapel. He was also excluded by the general assembly of the kirk of Scotland, on account of his supposed heresies. Still he found followers and supporters. Spacious places of meeting were opened for him, and he continued to pour forth the floods of his fiery eloquence, with unquenchable enthusiasm, until his strength was exhausted, and he was warned by his physicians that it could be restored only by travel and repose. He went into Wales, from thence to Lancashire, and thence to Glasgow, where he expired, December 6, 1834, in the forty-third year of his age. He was as sensible to the last, and his departing words were, "In life or in death, I am the Lord's!"

It can hardly be denied that Mr. Irving possessed the elements of both a great and a good man, and his extraordinary career and end are just cause of regret and lamentation. Coleridge said of him in 1833, "I had watched with astonishment and admiration the wonderful and rapid development of his powers. Never was such unexampled advance of intellect, as between his first and second volumes of sermons. The first full of Gallicisms, and Scotchisms, and all other cisms; the second discovering all the elegance and power of the best writers of the Elizabethan age. And then so sudden a fall, when his mighty energies made him so terrible to sinners. Never can I describe how much it has wrong my bosom." Chris. Observer; Presbyterian; Christian Advocate; M. Lellan's Journal.

IVIMEY, (JOSEPH), secretary of the Baptist Irish society, and author of the History of the English Baptists, was born in 1773, and died February 8, 1834, in the sixty-first year of his age. He was, we believe, a graduate of the Bristol institution, and for twenty-nine years pastor of the Baptist church, Eagle street, London. He is characterized as a faithful and laborious servant of Christ. He published Bunyan's Pilgrim, with Notes; the Life of Bunyan; a Treatise on Baptism and Communion; the Life, Times and Opinions of Milton; but the great work of his pen was his History of the English Baptists, in four volumes octavo, the first volume of which appeared in 1812, and the last in 1832. This work is said by Robert Hall to be written in a perspicuous, lively, and unaffected style, to abound in curious and valuable information hitherto little known to the religious public, drawn up with great care and impartiality, and to constitute a permanent monument of the author's talent and devotedness to the cause of religious truth and liberty.

Mr. Ivimey's dying bed presented a beautiful and impressive scene. His health began to fail in 1833. In October of that year he resigned his secretaryship, and withdrew from all public engagements. His last sermon was delivered December 8th, from 2 Tim. 1: 12: "I know whom I have believed," &c. From this time he suffered much, and once said to a friend, "Here I lie, a perfect wreck on the shores of mercy. Why my life is prolonged, I cannot tell. It is sufficient for me to know that it is my heavenly Father's will."—"I am no longer the Lord's working servant, but I trust I am his resting servant."—"Oh that I may see his face!" One remarking that he would soon join "an innumerable company of angels," he replied, "Yes, and in whom, though now I see him not, yet believing I rejoice." His habitual tranquillity was a fine illustration of Isa. 26: 3; he would frequently say,—

"And not a wave of trouble rolls, Across my peaceful breast."

"I have no fears, no misgivings; I trust in the word of God for support. I have nothing else to trust in."—Lon. Evng. Mag.; Chris. Wag. M.

JEBB, (JOHN, D. D.), bishop of Limerick, Ireland, a distinguished preacher and biblical scholar. He was born at Drogheda, September 27, 1775. He was educated at Dublin university, where he gained a high reputation. He was greatly esteemed in subsequent life as a man of most amiable and gentle spirit, an accomplished orator, and able theologian. As a clergyman and bishop he was truly exemplary. He died at Wandsworth, in Surry, England, December 9, 1833, aged fifty-eight. His original publications are not numerous, but are of high merit. They have taken a stand among the best works of the age. Among them are a volume of "Sermons on subjects chiefly Practical," "Essay on Sacred Literature," and "Practical Theology."—Am. Almanac; London Christian Observer.

LUTHERAN EVANGELICAL CHURCH. That eminent reformer whose name is dear to all the friends of evangelical religion throughout the world, has given name to the largest body of Protestant Christians. It is of little consequence to inquire how this has happened; but the probability is that Luther himself gave the church the name of Evangelical, while his followers, or their adversaries, gave it the name of Lutheran.

History. The history of Luther and the Lutherans is intimately connected with almost all the transactions in Germany, and the northern kingdoms of Europe, in the sixteenth century. They have been a hundred times detailed by different historians, civil and ecclesiastical, and were it necessary, which it is not, it would be impossible to give even the most abridged sketch of them here. We must therefore satisfy ourselves with referring to the article LUTHER, in the body of the work.

Doctrines. The Augsburg confession, consisting of twenty-one articles, is the acknowledged standard of faith for the Lutherans, wherever they are found. (See AGOSBURGH CONFESSION.) These articles, with diffusive notes, critical and explanatory, may be found in Lochman's History of the Doctrine and Discipline of the Church, published at Harrisburg, (Pa.) It is pretty generally agreed that Luther himself was a decided advocate for some points of doctrine which his followers have wholly abandoned, such as human impotence, irresistible grace, and absolute predestination to life. Hence these have been called the doctrines of the Reformation. On the subject of predestination and election nothing indeed is said in the Augsburg confession; but the Lutherans now maintain in regard to the divine decrees, that they respect the salvation or misery of men only in consequence of a previous knowledge of their sentiments and character. In other words they hold to a conditional, instead of a gratuitous election unto life; and in this they differ from the Calvinists. The Lutherans as a body are Trinitarians; but in Germany many of their doctors are theologians, and many of the evangelical class profess the hope of a universal restoration. (See NEOLOGY; RESTORATIONISTS; and UNIVERSALISERS.)

With respect to the Lord's supper the Lutherans believe in what is called consubstantiation, holding that the real body and blood of Jesus is united in a mysterious manner, through the consecration, with the bread and wine. It is said that Luther taught this, by saying that "Jesus Christ is in the bread, just as fire is in red-hot iron. Though the Lutherans consider their doctrine a great improvement upon transubstantiation, yet the Catholics think it amounts to about the same thing. In this country, few Lutherans seem anxious to defend their own doctrine on this point, but place it among the crude notions of the reformer, which they suppose at the present day he would have given up.

Government, &c. In every country where Lutheranism is established, (says Mosheim) the supreme head of the state is at the same time the supreme visible ruler of the church; but all civil rulers of the Lutheran persuasion are effectually restrained by the fundamental principles of the doctrine they profess, from any attempts to change or destroy the established rule of faith and manners; to make any alteration in the essential doctrines of their religion, or in any thing that is intimately connected with them, or to impose their particular opinions upon their subjects in a despotic and arbitrary manner. The councils or societies appointed by the sovereign to watch over the interests of the church, and direct and govern its affairs, are composed of persons versed in the knowledge both of civil and of ecclesiastical law, and, according to a very ancient denomination, are called consistories.

The internal administration of the Luther church seems to be somewhat anomalous; they have bishops, but no diocesan episcopacy except in Denmark and Sweden; they hold to the parity of ministers, and yet to a certain subordination in rank and privileges, the degrees of which however are not distinctly defined. Where the civil government is of a republican form the ministers together form a body for the purpose of governing the church, and examining and ordaining ministers, as in Hamburg, Frankfurt, and the United States of America. The ministers are everywhere under the inspection of an ecclesiastical overseer, or senior, in Germany; and Sweden; superintendents, inspectors, and make reports to the consistories, synods, or ministeriums. He is regarded as primus in paribus, first among his equals. There is but one Lutheran archbishop, the primate of Sweden, but his is little more than a civil title, as neither his revenue nor his authority answer to this office in other churches.

Among the American Lutherans there are three judicatories, viz. 1. The vestry of the congregation. 2. The district or special conference. 3. The general synod. From the decision of this last body there is no appeal. The synod is composed of ministers, and an equal number of laymen, chosen as deputies by the vestries of their respective congregations; this directs the external affairs of the church.

The ministerium, which also meets once a year, is composed of ministers only, and regulates the internal or spiritual affairs, such as judging in controversies concerning doctrine, and examining, licensing, and ordaining ministers, &c.

The Lutherans in all countries have liturgies, which are essentially the same in all the articles of religion, but which differ widely in many things of an indifferent nature. Their liturgies are simple, compared with those of some other countries, and the Lutherans are at liberty to use extempore prayer if they choose.

Confirmation is practised among the Lutherans, by which they intend a solemn renewal or ratification of their baptismal vows, at which time the pastor of the congregation imposes his hands on the confirmed, accompanied by prayer. Those who are thus confirmed become communicants.

Confession and absolution in a very simple form are also practised. After a lecture preparatory to the communion, some questions are put to the audience, which are answered in the affirmative. The congregation then kneels. One of them with an audible voice repeats a confession of sins. The minister then adds a few ejaculations; and after all have stood up he pronounces a pardon and absolution to all the truly penitent.

From Lochman's account it would seem that the evidence of real conversion is not required in order to an admission to the Lord's supper.

Lutheranism is the established religion in Denmark, Norway, Sweden, and a great part of Germany, particularly in the north, and in Saxony; also in Livonia, Esthonia, and the greatest part of Prussia.

There are likewise Lutheran churches in Holland, Courland, Russia, Hungary, the Danish West India islands, and many other parts of the world, especially France, England, and the United States. Their whole population cannot fall much short of twenty millions.

The Lutherans have probably a greater number of universities under their direction than any other religious body, unless it be the Roman Catholics. They are also very generally engaged in the Bible, missionary, and other benevolent operations.

In 1817, a union was formed in Germany between the Lutherans and Calvinists. Before this event it was so uncommon a thing for Lutheran ministers to be pastors of Calvinist churches, and vice versa; but it seems not improbable now that they are consolidated into one body.

LUTHERANS IN THE UNITED STATES.

Among the first settlers of Pennsylvania and the adjoining states were some of the Lutheran persuasion, from Germany, Sweden, &c. Being in need of ministers, they sought assistance from professor Franck of Halle, who took measures to supply them. By means of this excellent man, Rev. Messrs. Muelenberg, Kurtz, Schaum, Brunkoltz, Kuntz, Voigt, Krug, Schultz, Helmuth, and other eminent men, being ordained for the purpose, were sent over to this country. Among the next company of ministers sent over from the mother country, were Rev. Messrs. Nussman, Arndt, Storch, Rechen, and Bernhard.

In South Carolina and Georgia, many Lutherans, particularly from Wittenberg, had settled during the reign of George II., some of whose descendants have intermixed with other denominations, while others maintain a steadfast attachment to the religion of their ancestors, and have formed themselves into churches, which for the most part are united with the synod of North Carolina.

In all the middle, southern, and western states, the Lutherans have congregations established, which maintain a communion and correspondence with each other.

The American Lutherans publish annually the Minutes of their synods; in which, besides detailing the business they transact, they publish returns of baptisms, confirmations, funerals, congregations, and communicants. They have also a paper, called the Lutheran Observer, published at Baltimore, (Md.) which is the organ of the denomination. They have a regular establishment for the publication of books.

They have a flourishing seminary at Hartwick, Otsego county, New York; another in Lexington, South Carolina; another on a smaller scale in Green county, Tennessee, for the purpose of educating young men for the gospel ministry. But their principal institution for this purpose, is the Theological Seminary at Gettysburg, Pennsylvania.

The Lutherans in the United States have (1834) about 800 congregations, and about 50,000 communicants.

Among the eminent men belonging to this extensive body it is difficult to make a selection. After Luther we may however name as more generally known in this country, Melancthon, Muhllens, Moelsheim, Spener, Franck, Semler, Paulus, Greisbach, Eichhorn, Doedelin, Hencke, Herder, Ernesti, Morus, Reinhard, Knapp, Titmann, Schrimmacher, Muelenberg, &c. &c. Others also will be found in the body of this work.—Mosheim; Benedict's History of all Religions, Ency. Am; Shoher; Lochman; Robinson's Biblical Repository; Prof. Schumacher's Popular Theology, 1834.

ed him with the means of travelling through the interior and eastern parts of the island. He also visited the island of Madura, and spread many thousand tracts and Testaments over Java and Borneo. On his return he visited Malacca, and provided Jho, Bintang, Tringano, and Siak with Christian tracts.

When he arrived at Macao a second edition of the New Testament was published in a more portable form, and in 1815, the first Chinese convert, Tse-ao-ko, was baptized. Malacca having been fixed upon as a permanent central situation for the mission, Dr. Milne here began to prosecute the system of education, which has since been the basis of Protestant missions in China. Many opportunities also occurred of circulating the Scriptures, by means of trading vessels and passengers, in Cochin China, China, Siam, and the Malay Archipelago. In 1816, a monthly magazine and several religious works were issued from the Malacca press, and a Chinese convert of the name of Aia was baptized by Mr. Milne. See his "Retrospect of the Chinese Mission."

In 1817, he visited China, and with Dr. Morrison projected the plan of an Anglo-Chinese college, took part in the translation of the Old Testament into Chinese, and set on foot the Indo-Chinese Gleaner, a quarterly publication, containing valuable remarks on Chinese usages, literature, and government. He also established a Samaritan society, composed of Chinese and the members of the mission, to take care of the helpless, sick, and aged, which has done incalculable good.

This excellent man, whose talents were surprising, whose labors were incessant, whose whole life was devoted to his Savior, died in 1822, by his death the Chinese suffered an irreparable loss, though the schools continue to increase, and the preaching to the heathen is still maintained in Malacca.—Gutzlaff's History of China.

MISSIONARY SOCIETIES. On the general subject of missions, the reader will find some interesting information in the articles MISSION, MISSIONARY SPIRIT, and VOLUNTARY ASSOCIATIONS; ELLIOT, MAYHEW, BRAINEAD, and KIRKLAND, &c., in the body of the work. Owing to the present state of particular missions, he will of course consult the Missionary Gazetteer, at the close. We have reserved to the end of the Appendix, the sketches of the various missionary and other benevolent societies of the present day, which will be found under their proper names, arranged in alphabetical order.

MORRISON, (ROBERT, LL. D.) This eminent man, the senior member of the Chinese mission, is an illustrious example of the usefulness of Sabbath schools. A Sabbath school teacher, it is said, some years ago picked up a poor ragged boy in the streets, introduced him into his school, interested and instructed him, and that boy became the future missionary to China, and the translator of the Bible into that language, spoken by nearly four hundred millions of the human race. After becoming pious, he studied some time at Hoxton academy, and then finished his preparation for his work at the Missionary seminary, Gosport. His mind was at that time so deeply penetrated with the deplorable state of those "who know not God," that, to use his own words, he "would have gone to any part of the world where the people were without a divine revelation." When Mungo Park had the prospect of forming a settlement for the British government in Africa, he had it in contemplation to accompany that ill-fated traveller. But Providence otherwise ordered. Under the patronage of the London Missionary society, Dr. Morrison went to China in 1807, and ever since that period has been unwearied in his efforts to extend the kingdom of Christ over that vast empire. A short but interesting account of his labors may be found in the second volume of Gutzlaff's recent History of China. He says, "After having obtained a Latin-Chinese dictionary, and the Harmony of the Four Gospels in Chinese, from the British museum, Dr. Morrison sailed, in 1807, by way of America, for Canton, accompanied by the prayers of thousands. He landed in the September of the same year at Macao, and created a good deal of suspicion among the Romish clergy."

"In Canton he lived during that season in a godown, where he studied, ate, and slept. He let his nails grow, that they might be like those of the Chinese, wore a tail, and became an adept in the use of chopsticks. In the factory he walked about in a Chinese frock, and wore Chinese shoes. But seeing that his wish to conform to the prejudices of the natives had not the desired effect of conciliating their affection, he abandoned their costume and dressed like a European.

Very soon afterward he was introduced to Sir George Staunton, a member of the British factory, and became by his means acquainted with Mr. Roberts, the chief. As it was Mr. Morrison's principal object to translate the Scriptures into Chinese, Mr. Roberts, on his death-bed, remarked: "I see not why your translating the sacred Scriptures into the Chinese language might not be avowed, if occasion called for it. We (the members of the factory) could with reason answer the Chinese thus:—'This volume we deem the best of books.'" It was in a somewhat similar way that the British ambassador at the court of Persia introduced a copy of the New Testament to the notice of the Persian monarch. The arrival of some troops from Bengal, in 1808, in order to garrison Macao, put him under the necessity of leaving Canton. He had, during all this time, studied Chinese, both the Canton and mandarin dialects, and even offered up his private prayers to the Almighty in that language. Shortly afterward he was nominated Chinese translator to the British factory, which situation greatly facilitated the accomplishment of his views. He now began to have on Sunday a religious meeting at his house with some few Chinese, highly delighted at the feeble beginnings in so great a work. Having ascertained that a copy of the Acts of the Apostles, which he had brought out with him, was perfectly intelligible, he printed it, and completed also a Chinese grammar, with the gospel of St. Luke, in 1810-11. This was printed and printed the New Testament in tract, till the British and Foreign Bible society took three hundred pounds towards the translating, printing, and circulating of the sacred Scriptures in China. The Roman Catholic missionaries had spent more than two centuries in China, and amongst them there were many who understood the Chinese language thoroughly, and wrote it elegantly. They have published the lives of saints, their scholastic divinity, and other works, but never ventured upon translating the oracles of God, and making them intelligible to so many millions! Dr. Morrison endeavored to imitate in the translation the most approved works of the Chinese, but could not introduce the style of the classics, which is too concise, and without commentaries, unintelligible to the natives themselves. During the years 1813 and 1814, he undertook the instruction of four orphan boys, both in their native language, in the principles of Christianity. As the Chinese prize education, and have made literary acquirements the road to office, the establishment of schools has since proved very beneficial to the promotion of Christianity. In 1815, he was joined by the late Mr. Milne, "whose talents," Gutzlaff says, "were surprising, whose labors incessant." In that year, Dr. Morrison prepared a version of the New Testament for the press. In 1816, he accompanied the English embassy to Peking, and had an ample opportunity of making "himself acquainted with both the spirit of the government and the people." Dr. Morrison had in the mean while written several tracts upon the doctrines of Christianity; by the perusal of one, "The Redemption of the World," a wretch, who had formerly been a Roman Catholic, was reclaimed from his vicious life. He had also the great satisfaction of giving the New Testament to the largest nation of the world in their own language. In this work he had been greatly assisted by a manuscript translation of the Acts, and some of Paul's epistles. In connexion with Dr. Milne, he completed the translation of the Old Testament in 1819. In 1822, he finished his Chinese and English dictionary, of which seven hundred and fifty copies were published, in five quarto volumes, at the expense of the East India company, who reserved to themselves one hundred copies. In 1817, Drs. Morrison and Milne projected the Anglo-Chinese college at Malacca, an invaluable institution. Dr. Morrison appropriated fifteen hundred pounds towards its establishment. He was, for a long time, Chinese translator to the British factory, and received for his services 500 pounds per annum. He published Hora Sinica, or translations from the popular literature of China. In 1825, he came to England, bringing with him a collection of 10,000 Chinese books. He remained but one year, his object being to give instruction to missionary students on the study of the Chinese language. On his return to China he settled at Caeton, where, besides other missionary labors, he conducted the Chinese Repository, in English, and another monthly periodical in Chinese. He also instructed a number of Chinese youth in the truths of Christianity. His useful life terminated, in the joy of his Lord, August 1, 1834.

A short time before his lamented death, Dr. Morrison wrote a letter to a friend in America, from which the following is an extract. "I beseech you, if you have influence among the opulent Christians in America, to consider the practicability of a Bible ship, to navigate the shores of eastern Asia. If science, and discovery, and luxury, and commerce, have their ships sailing the ocean, and visiting every shore, why should it be thought strange that the Christian should also have his ship to convey to man the written mandate of his Maker—the message of mercy from the Savior of the world?" This gave occasion to the following spirited stanzas.

THE BIBLE SHIP.

Flint out our banners to the breeze!
Be every sail unfurled!
Our ship must cleave the farthest seas,
And search the heathen world.

Pipe up all hands! the boatswain's cry
Rang never cheer like this;
We're off—we proudly dash on high,
And stoop to the abyss.

Speed on! we steer for lovely isles,
Where lies of guilt the ban;
And sunny continents, where smiles
Each gladsome thing but man.

And Africa, the clime of night—
And shores by Chinese trod,
Shall joy for us; we bring true light—
The priceless word of God.

Speed on the King's discovery ship!
She seeks not vassal ground,
Nor scans the varying needle's dip—
The lost, the lost is found!

Speed on! speed on! a thousand sail
Are flapping on the mast,
For dark lands soon to breast the gale,
God's Bible there to cast.

Speed on! speed on! the broad blue deeps
Shall hastening heralds bear
To every pagan coast, where weeps
A soul in sin's despair.

Oh God, to see their canvass speck,
Like birds, the distant seas!
Oh God, to see each noble deck
Thronged by the feet of these!

NEANDER, (Augustus), the great historian of the Christian church, was born of Jewish parents at Hamburg, January 16, 1789. At what time he was baptized, and entered into the Lutheran church, is unknown; but it must have been at an early age. An eminent bookseller of Hamburg related to professor Robinson, that about thirty years ago, a bashful, awkward boy was accustomed to come to his shop, and spend hours and days in the perusal of books which were lying about, in total abstraction, and regardless of every thing which was passing around him. This circumstance soon excited attention; and on inquiry the bookseller was so much interested in the situation of the poor youth, and in the extraordinary mental powers exhibited by him, as freely to furnish him with the books he wanted, and also ultimately to unite with a few friends to afford him the means of obtaining a liberal education. Such was the commencement of Neander's career; and nobly has he repaid the sympathy and care of his early friends. His earliest patron is now the publisher of his works; and the relation between them, though changed in its external form, has yet lost nothing of the mutual respect and confidence in which it was originally founded.

Neander pursued his studies at the university of Gottingen, where he was afterwards repetent. In 1812, he was called as professor extraordinary to Heidelberg, where he remained three or four years. About the year 1815, he was transferred to the university of Berlin, of which he has ever since been one of the ornaments; and his lectures and influence have continued not less than those of any other person, to elevate that university to the pre-eminence of rank which it now holds among the schools of Germany.

The department of theology to which Neander has principally devoted his attention, is ecclesiastical history. But the course which he has taken, and the point of view which he has adopted, are new, peculiar, and striking. No ordinary training or qualifications would enable the historian to do justice to his subject, regarded in this light; This Neander felt; and he has, therefore, shaped the studies of his life accordingly. Endued with great sagacity, and a memory of prodigious power, and trained to habits of iron diligence, he has studied to a greater extent, and with larger results than any man now living, all the works of the fathers and other ancient writers, as, also, all the writings of the middle ages, which have any bearing upon either the external or internal history of the Christian religion. He has entered into their very spirit, and made himself master of all their stores. These are points on which there is no question among the scholars of Germany, of any sect or name. What Neander affirms upon any subject connected with such studies, comes with the weight of the highest authority; because it is understood and known to be the result of minute personal investigation, united with entire candor and a perfect love of truth.

The character of his writings corresponds to such a course of preparation. They are not a mere narrative of the actions of persons, and the progress of events; but they bring before the reader the very persons themselves, as thinking, speaking, acting, in all their living power and energy; their thoughts become visible to us, their very words are repeated to us, their actions take place, as it were, before our eyes. It is the same graphic power of vivid representation, applied to the true delineations of real character and history, which gives to the half-history pages of Scott their magic charm. His successive writings all serve to mark the progress of his studies; while at the same time they have laid open many new views and treasures of ancient things. In a special manner, he was the first to introduce light and order into the chaos of the Gnostic systems. All his previous works have also served directly, if not intentionally, as preparatory to the great work on which he is now laboring, his General History of the Christian Religion and the Church. Besides all this, he has now been for twenty years constantly lecturing upon these subjects, usually two hours, at least, in every day. (See MILLER, and GEISLER.)

Neander has published nothing except in the historical department of theology; but as a lecturer, his hearers are yet more numerous in his courses of systematic and exegetical theology, than in his historical course. His exegetical lectures are confined to the New Testament, and are most frequented. In these he brings the results of all his researches and of his vast reading in bear upon his illustration both of the letter and the spirit of the text; and with very great effect. Indeed the lectures of Neander upon the New Testament are superior to those of any living lecturer in Germany; inasmuch as they unfold to the hearer the ideas of the original in the very form and spirit in which they would appear to have existed in the minds of the sacred writers themselves. His lectures are less philological than those of many others; indeed he has little of the parade of philology, while the fact that he possesses the thing itself is obvious both from the results which he presents, and also from the circumstance, that on proper occasions he can and does enter into all the minute philological details, in which German scholars are supposed to be peculiarly at home. On the other hand, he is distinguished for his attention to the logical part of the exegesis, and is full of illustrations drawn from the connexion, the train and progress of the thoughts, as well as from the scope of the writer, the character of his mind, his spirit, his conceptions of Christianity, and the external relations and circumstances in which he was placed. It is a striking trait in the character of Neander's mind, that he is accustomed to take profound and expanded views of every subject, while at the same time he is capable of surveying it in its minutest details; two qualities which are rarely found united in the same mind.

In his private character and deportment, Neander is kind and amiable, emphatically "doing good to all as he has opportunity." His friends relate that the writings of John are his favorite books of Scripture; and they ascribe this to a similarity between his taste and feelings and spirit, and those of the beloved apostle.

Neander is almost the only theologian in Germany whose views of the divine and native power of Christianity are such, as to lead him to wish everywhere to trust religion with its own support. In the minds of most, it seems to be regarded as necessary that religion should be established as a matter of state policy, and receive support as such from the state. These latter, reason from the existing state of things in Germany and the adjacent countries; Neander draws his conclusions from the nature and spirit of Christianity itself, and is accustomed to appeal to the present aspect of the American churches in proof of the soundness of his views.—Robinson's Biblical Repository, No. ix.

OPIE, (Mrs. AMELIA), was born in 1771. She is the daughter of Dr. Anderson, an eminent physician of Norwich. This lady early evinced superior talents by composing poems and descriptive pieces, at an age when young ladies have not usually finished their education. In 1793 she married Mr. Opie, a celebrated painter, and soon after his death, in 1808, she published a memoir of his life, prefixed to the lectures he had read at the Royal academy. By this and by other publications she has acquired reputation both as a prose and a poetical writer. Her Works, published in seven or eight volumes, breathe a pure Christian morality.

PATERINES; a large denomination of dissenters from the church of Rome in the middle ages. They resided in Italy. The origin and import of the name are disputed. Some derive it from a street in Milan called Pateria, where many of them lived; some regard it as synonymous with the English word illiterate, or low bred, and suppose it bestowed on them because they were chiefly of the lower orders, mechanics, laborers, &c.; but in the edict of the emperor of the Romans, Frederick II., for their extirpation, in 1224, it is said, "They call themselves PATERINES, after the example of the martyrs." Hence Mr. Jones concludes that the name was probably derived from the Latin verb patior, (or the Italian patire), "to suffer," and therefore signifies "sufferers."

It is remarkable that in the examinations of these persecuted Christians, they are not taxed with any immoralities, but are condemned for errors of opinion, or rather for virtuous rules of action, which all then in power accounted heresies. They were charged in the edict with denying the Trinity, but there is no evidence of this. They said that a Christian church ought to consist only of good people; that a church had no power to frame any constitutions; that it was not right to take oaths; that it was not lawful to kill mankind; that a man ought not to be delivered up to officers of justice to be converted; that the benefits of society belonged alike to all the members of it; that a faith without works could not save any man; that the church ought not to persecute any, even the wicked; that the law of Moses was no rule for Christians; that there was no need of priests, especially of wicked ones; that the sacraments, and orders, and ceremonies of the church of Rome, were futile, expensive, oppressive, and wicked; with many more such positions, all inimical to the hierarchy. They made no complaint of the mode of baptizing in the Catholic church, (which was then immersion,) but objected vehemently against the baptism of infants, and condemned it as an error. Among other things they said, "That a child knew nothing of the matter, that he had no desire to be baptized, and was incapable of making any confession of faith, and the willing and professing of another could be of no service to him." They had no contention with the Catholic church; for they rejected not only Jerome of Syria, Augustine of Africa, and Gregory of Rome, but Ambrose of Milan; considering them and other pretended fathers as corruptors of Christianity. They particularly condemned pope Sylvester as Antichrist. They called the sign of the cross the mark of the beast. They took no share in the state; for they took no oaths, and wore no arms. The state for a long time did not trouble them; but the clergy preached, prayed, and published books against them with unremitting zeal, and at length drew down upon them the imperial edict in 1224.

The light of history discovers these dissenters to us in the duchy of Milan before the year 1026, and some regard them as identical with the Paulicians, who it is said about this time began to emigrate from Bulgaria into the west of Europe. But Atto, bishop of Vercoelli, had complained of such people eighty years before; and so had others befor him, and there is the highest reason to believe that they had always existed in Italy. Still it is probable that they were greatly increased by the emigrant Paulicians. (See WALDENSES.)

In 1040 they had become very numerous in Milan, which was their principal residence; and here they flourished at least two hundred years. There was no legal power to put dissenters to death. Their churches were organized into sixteen compartments or associations. In 1190, Bonacursi, a renegade, reported that cities, suburbs, towns, and castles, were full of them; that it was high time to suppress them; and that the prophet Jeremiah had taught the Milanese what to do, when he said, "Cursed be he that keepeth back his sword from blood!" It seems that this bloody advice was followed; for the fate of 424 describes the innocent Esterius as "being proud of their lives and fearlessness of destruction," and goes on to say, "horrible to express, the survivors are not terrified by their example!" And though the edict delivers them over to the flames of the inquisition, yet Reinerius, in 1259, thirty-five years after, says thousands of them existed in Italy.—See Jeans' History of the Christian Church.

RAMMOHUN ROY, (Rajah.) This learned Brahmin, who has of late years attracted so much of the public attention, was born in the province of Burdwan, in Bengal, his paternal ancestors being Brahmins of a high order. He studied several years at Benares, and afterwards travelled in Persia and other oriental countries. His literary attainments were extensive. He was acquainted with ten languages, Sanscrit, Arabic, Persian, Hindostanee, Bengalee, English, Greek, French, Persian, Bengalee, and English.

At sixteen, this extraordinary man composed a manuscript against the idolatry of the Hindoes, which provoked his father to disinheret him. But upon the death of his father and brother in 1803, he acquired a large property, and immediately commenced his plans of reformation, by publishing a work entitled, "Against the Idolatry of the Greeks, Persians, Bengalee, and English." He has published works in five—Sanskrit, Arabic, Persian, Bengalee, and English.

involve responsibilities. Therefore in every family there goes on, not only a silent operation of law-giving, but also a secret operation of law-enforcing, a system of rewards and punishments—judgment as well as affection being the standard of the other of the same thing is true of the school, in every one of its gradations. In the state also we find the same principle of responsibility regulating and ruling its affairs; with this difference, that here every thing is open and visible; the laws; the officers; the prisons; the courts; the days of trial, and decision, and execution.

These instances may serve to show how familiar to the mind of man is the feeling of responsibility, and how full his life is of its exercise; how he regulates himself after a law expressed or understood, and submits the issues of his character and his condition, to judgment and arbitration, and is himself the arbitrator and judge of the character and condition of others. They also serve to show how necessary to the well-being of every society is a judgment of the members, and a punishment of offenders. The conclusion is, that as from an existing state wherein man stands related to man, can judgment and execution of judgment be spared, so neither from the higher and more important relation which man sustains to God. From all kind of analogies we may argue the reasonableness, advantage, and, to an upright mind, pleasantness, of our responsibility to God, Rom. 2: 2-16, 14: 9-12, 4 Cor. 5: 10. SCOTT, (JOHN, A. M.), a valuable clergyman of the church of England, minister of St. Mary's, Hull, was the eldest son of Dr. Scott, the commentator. He was born in 1777, and educated under his father's care until his admission at Magdalen college, Cambridge, where, in 1799, he was distinguished as twelfth wrangler. The same year Mr. Scott was ordained as curate to the Rev. Thomas Dikes, minister of St. Mary's, Hull, and was shortly afterwards presented with the mastership of the grammar-school, the vicarage of North Ferry, and the lectureship of the Holy Trinity, the latter of which he retained till his death. In 1816 he was appointed to St. Mary's, Hull; but the whole amount of his clerical endowments being inadequate to the support of a large family, and his heart being filled with benevolent ardor, he was urged on to exertions that prematurely shortened his days. He died calmly, yet solemnly confiding in Christ as the foundation of his soul, November, 1834, at the age of fifty-seven, leaving a wife and ten children. His death was regarded as a public loss. To his comprehensive and active mind, the benevolent associations of the age, especially those in the church of England, owed much of their efficiency.

He was an able and forcible, though not a popular preacher, addressing the judgment of his hearers rather than their imagination and passions. Yet his sermons were by no means deficient in those appeals to "the love of Christ," which is the most powerfully constraining motive to Christian practice. The poor and afflicted of his flock are able to bear the most convincing testimony to the largeness and kindness of his heart. As a writer he resembled his father in his peculiarly strong sense, indefatigable research, and powers of reasoning. His life of his father is one of the most interesting pieces of biography extant, and has a wide circulation both in England and America. His largest work is the Continuation of Milner's Church History, the merits of which are generally acknowledged, and received the high commendation of Sir James Mackintosh. His "Calvin, and the Swiss Reformation," "Luther, and the Lutheran Reformation," prepared for the Christian Library, the last of which has been recently re-printed in this country, are able works. His vindication of Milner, against the attacks of Rev. H. James Rose, was published only a few weeks before his death.—Christian Guardian; Christian Observer; Episcopal Recorder, 1835.

SEVENTH DAY BAPTISTS. (See SABBAZIANS.)
SIX PRINCIPLE BAPTISTS. This body of Christians denominate themselves "Baptists," and of the "Ancient Order of the Six Principles of the doctrine of Christ and his Apostles." They are called Baptists, because they reject the doctrine of infant baptism, and hold nothing to be true baptism but the immersion of adult believers. They take the name Six Principle, from the six points of doctrine mentioned in Hebrews 6: 1, 2: "Therefore, leaving the principles of the doctrine of Christ, let us go on to perfection, not laying again the foundation of repentance from dead works, and of faith towards God, of the doctrine of baptisms, and of laying on of hands, and of the resurrection of the dead, and of eternal judgment." These points of theology they consider highly important to all who would flee the wrath to come, and enjoy the smiles of heaven. But though they take their name from these, they are tenacious of other principles, some of which are of infinite importance. They formerly practiced washing the feet of each other, in imitation of what Christ did for the apostles; but they have now dispensed with this custom. They consider baptism by immersion, and the laying on of hands after baptism, so highly important, that they will commune with none but such as have received both of these ordinances.

They believe with others in the following points of doctrine: the supreme divinity of Jesus Christ; the trinity of the Godhead; original depravity; salvation by faith; the absolute necessity of perseverance after the new birth; the resurrection of the body; the final judgment; the everlasting happiness of the righteous, and the eternal misery of the finally wicked.

This denomination, though small in point of numbers, is no new sect. We have before us the Minutes of their 164th anniversary meeting, published in 1834. They have in this (Rhode Island) conference eighteen preachers and one thousand seven hundred and forty-nine communicants.—Christian Watchman, 1835.

SMITH, (SIR EDWARD,) founder and first president of the English Linnean society, was born in Norwich, in 1759. He was a delicate and sensitive child, peculiarly susceptible both in mental and physical constitution; diffident, timid, and, as an aversion of the future botanist, fond of flowers. He received a domestic education; his parents being averse to public schools. His father, who was a pious, sensible, well-educated tradesman, wished him to settle in business, but yielded to the counsel of friends so far as to send him to the university of Edinburgh in 1781, that he might pursue the study of medicine. In 1782, he, in connexion with some fellow-students, formed a society of natural history. On his return two years after, he repaired to London, to prosecute his studies under Dr. Hunter and Plicairu. The library of the celebrated Linnæus being sold in consequence of the death of his son, it was purchased by young Smith for one thousand guineas. From this time he devoted himself chiefly to the study of botany; delivering lectures and composing his botanical works. In 1788, the Linnean society being established, he was chosen its president, his treasures forming its wealth. In 1814 he received the honor of knighthood. In 1818 he was a candidate for the botanical chair at Cambridge, but being a Unitarian dissenter, did not succeed. He died March, 1823. He published a Tour on the Continent; and various works on his favorite science, in which he gives us some elegant illustrations of Scripture.—Select Journal, &c.

TAYLOR, (JAMES BRAINERD.) This excellent young man was born at Middle Haddam, Connecticut, April 15, 1801. His first deep impressions of religion were received from the remarks of a brother under his father's roof. When placed as a clerk in the store of a merchant of New York, he attended the ministry of the Rev. Dr. Roney, and there at the age of fifteen first united in the commemoration of redeeming love. He soon engaged in the work of Sabbath school instruction, and by every other method in his power sought to promote his Redeemer's kingdom upon earth. In May, 1819, he was present at the sailing of Dr. Scudder with other missionaries for Ceylon, and from that time felt that he must renounce the mercantile for the ministerial life. His friends approving this course, he entered the academy of Lawrenceville, New Jersey, in 1820, and in November, 1823, joined the sophomore class at Nassau Hall. His whole academic life was characterized by communion with God, zeal in the performance of his duties, and unquenchable desires, coupled with untiring efforts to be useful. Twenty or thirty souls, it is believed, were turned to God by his instrumentality. His example also is a complete solution of the question, "Can a student enjoy religion at college?" His own language is, "These walls cannot shut out the Lord, and where he is, there is heaven. I do not find the obstacles I anticipated. My room has been made a Bethel; and I find it is growing better and better, instead of diminishing. My cup overflows." And about two years after, he says, "I have had during the last thirteen months the witnessing of God's Spirit with mine that I am born from above, and travelling towards heaven. The fruit of the Spirit has been from day to day, love, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost." In September, 1826, Mr. Taylor, having finished his collegiate course, left Princeton for New Haven, to pursue the study of theology. Early in 1827, he was seized with hemorrhage at the lungs. This cutting off his cherished hopes must have been truly bitter, yet such grace was given him, that he heard him pronounce it "sweet—sweet—sweet, beyond expression." In January, 1829, he visited Georgia for his health; returned to Connecticut, apparently better, in the summer; received licence from the Middlesex consociation; but soon found it necessary to return to the south. He died at the Union Theological seminary in Prince Edward, Virginia, March, 28, 1829; not quite twenty-eight years of age, but in full assurance of a glorious immortality. On his dying bed, he remarked "that he had endeavored to live in such a way, that when he came to die he should have nothing to do but to die." His last words were, "Strive, strive, enter the Kingdom of Heaven." Thus to his riling passion struck in death. What he exhorted others to be, while living, what he was himself, that, though dead, he yet speaketh, "Strive to be uncommon Christians!"—Memoir of J. B. Taylor, by Dr. Rice.

TEIGNMOUTH, (JOHN SHORE, Lord) was born in London, 1751, and sent early to India as a writer in the service of the East India company. While in that country he was intimate with Mr. Hastings, and under his government filled several important offices. In 1792 he succeeded to be governor of Bengal. In 1797 he was raised to a peerage of Ireland, and in 1798 retired from office and returned to England. He succeeded Sir William Jones in the presidency of the Asiatic society, and published the "Memoirs of his Life and Writings," in 1804. He fixed his residence at Clapham, near London, and took an active part with his friends Wilberforce, Thornton, C. Grant, G. Sharpe, &c. in the establishment of the Christian Observer. On the formation of the British and Foreign Bible society in 1804, Lord Teignmouth was chosen its first president. This honorable office he held till his death; and to the able, zealous, and prudent manner in which he conducted the affairs of the society, and to the catholic and amicable spirit in which he presided over it, the institution has been greatly indebted for its prosperity. He died February 14, 1835, aged eighty-two. His "Life" is announced in England.—American Almanac.

THOMASON. (THOMAS T.) late chaplain to the East India company, was born at Plymouth, England, June 7, 1774. In childhood he was remarkable only for sweetness of temper, quickness of apprehension, docility and diligence. When he was nine years of age, the Christian care of his tutor, and the prayerful love of his pious and widowed mother were rewarded, by beholding in her son decided evidence of spiritual feeling, and holy decision of character. At thirteen he was engaged as a teacher at Deptford, and at fifteen he accompanied Dr. Coke to the West Indies as French interpreter. Already he felt desirous to be engaged in the holy work of the gospel ministry. On his return from Africa, he was called by the bishop of the island of the Eland institution in Yorkshire, and after preparatory study with the Rev. Mr. Clark, of Chesham, an excellent Hebrew scholar, entered Magdalen college, Cambridge, in 1792. Here he had a high standing as a scholar and a Christian, received the gold medal for the Norrison prize essay, and secured the intimate friendship of the Rev. Mr. Simeon, so well known to the Christian world. On leaving college in 1795, he was ordained deacon by the bishop of Ely, and appointed Mr. Simeon's curate at Cambridge, and in the villages of Shelford and Stapleford. He was also chosen to a fellowship in Queen's college, is 1797, and in 1798 to a tutorship, the duties of which he discharged, an well as those of his curacy, in the spirit of a truly spiritual and devoted servant of Christ. He was admitted presbyter by the bishop of Litchfield and Coventry in 1798, and the next year was married to Miss Fawcett, of Newbyr castle, a union conducive as much to his spiritual as his temporal happiness.

For six years he lived at Cambridge in the enjoyment of the greatest domestic and pastoral felicity, beloved by his people, and esteemed for his arduous and affectionate labors; but in 1805, his soul was stirred to look at the distressing condition of the multitudes who are perishing for lack of knowledge. The self-denying zeal of such men as Whitfield, Wesley, and Henry Martyn, the latter of whom was then going out to India, affected his heart, and determined him to devote himself to some more necessary field of Christian exertion. No opportunity, however, was opened to him until 1808, when he obtained an appointment to India. He sailed with his family, June 10, in the ship Travers, but after a pleasant voyage the ship struck the rocks on the coast of Pegu, and went to the bottom. Mr. Thomason and most of the crew narrowly escaped, and arrived in Calcutta, November 19. He was warmly welcomed by the mission church, "as a minister preserved to them of God." Notwithstanding the loss of his library and all his stores, "he had not endured the greatest of all losses, that of the benefit mercifully intended by his sufferings."

Master's work in India. He pressed through a host of difficulties and discouragements, arising not merely from the condition of the Hindoos, but from the indifference or opposition of those then in power. He lived down prejudice, and won the confidence and esteem of all classes of society. He set on foot or promoted various useful institutions, especially the Hindoo college at Calcutta; was made chaplain to the earl of Morar, governor-general; and, at length, and to the arrival of bishop Heber, in 1824, was promoted to the cathedral. In 1826 he was obliged to leave India on account of the failing health of Mrs. Thomason, who died during the voyage to England. He preached a while at Cheltenham, but in 1828 returned to India. He was seized soon after his return with a dropsical complaint, which terminated his useful life at the Isle of France, June 21, 1829. He departed "full of praise, but lying low at the bed of death."

Mr. Thomason occupied a high rank as an oriental scholar, especially in Hebrew, Arabic, Persian, and Hindostanee. He nearly completed a version of the Old Testament in Hindostanee. His memory will be cherished with that of Henry Martyn, whom in character he so much resembled.—Surgeon's Memoir of his Life.

W.

WAKEFIELD. (PRISCILLA) author of many popular works for the young, was born 1751. She was the eldest daughter of Daniel Bell and Catharine Barclay, granddaughter of the celebrated Robert Barclay; was married to Mr. Edward Wakefield, merchant, London, in 1774; and was aunt to Mrs. Fry, so well known for her benevolent labors in behalf of prisoners. Mrs. Wakefield was a pious member of the society of Friends or Quakers, and was one of the earliest promoters of those provident institutions, called savings banks. She died in London, September 12, 1832.—Am. Almanac.

WARING. (GOLSTON M.) pastor of the first Baptist church in Monrovia, Western Africa, was a native of Virginia, where he was born in 1792. He embarked for Liberia in 1824. Few men have rendered more essential service for the public welfare. He was a member of the council for that rising colony. As a minister of the gospel, he was zealous, meek, and an ornament to the sacred office. This faithful laborer in his Master's vineyard was permitted to see the church under his care increase to above two hundred members, in a few years, and out of a population not exceeding two thousand old and young; and a second church formed out of the first with flourishing prospects. He died in 1831, at the age of forty-two.—Liberia Herald; Christian Watchman; Am. Bap. Mag.; African Repository.

WISNER. (BENJAMIN E. D. D.) late senior secretary of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, was born in Goshen, New York, September 29, 1794, and graduated at Union college, in 1813. He spent some time in the study of the law, and also as a tutor in the college. Having pursued a course of theological study in the theological seminary at Princeton, he was invited to Boston, and was settled as pastor of the Old South church in that city in 1821. Here he continued to labor with fidelity and increasing reputation, until, upon the decease of the Rev. Dr. Cornelius, he was chosen one of the secretaries of the American Board. In the division of duties among the secretaries the intercourse with the churches of this country, in other words, the home correspondence, devolved on him; and no man was better fitted for this laborious and responsible service.—He died by a sudden and violent attack of scarlet fever, February 9, 1835, at the age of forty. Of his last hours, we regret that we are not now able to give any information.

It is remarkable that in less than four years, the American Board has suffered the loss of three valuable secretaries—Everts, Cornelius, and Wisner. (See EVERTS, and CORNELIUS.) Before the death of Mr. Everts, the domestic correspondence had so increased, that some arrangements for conducting it with greater ease and efficiency became indispensable. For this purpose a system of permanent agencies and larger auxiliaries, &c. was conceived. Dr. Wisner was spared till by his faithfulness, energy, and very superior judgment, he had brought this system very near its completion. The business of his department was left in admirable order, though he was so suddenly called away, in the inscrutable providence of God, to a higher world of holy action than this, after an illness of only four days. His death produced a deep and solemn sensation. It was felt that a great loss had been sustained, not only by his mourning family and friends, but by the religious community. Dr. Wisner lived and labored to do good. He was eminently a public man. All interested in benevolent and Christian efforts were accustomed to look to him for wise counsels and efficient aid. He filled a station of great usefulness and responsibility. The care of the churches, and the advancement of the cause of God, continually occupied his thoughts, his affections, his prayers. For these objects he cheerfully toiled, day by day, in season and out of season, to the last. Blessed is that servant, whom his Master when he cometh shall find so doing.

Dr. Wisner published three Discourses on the History of the Old South Church; a Sermon on the Benefits of Sunday Schools; and the invaluable Memoir of Mrs. Huntington, which will long maintain his memory in the hearts of the whole Christian world. He also contributed to the Spirit of the Pilgrime, and to the Comprehensive Commentary.—Boston Recorder; Christian Watchman.

BENEVOLENT SOCIETIES OF THE AGE.

AMERICAN ANTI-SLAVERY SOCIETY. (See ANTI-SLAVERY SOCIETIES.)

AMERICAN BAPTIST BOARD OF FOREIGN MISSIONS. (See BAPTIST BOARD OF FOREIGN MISSIONS, AMERICAN.)

AMERICAN BAPTIST HOME MISSION SOCIETY. (See HOME MISSION SOCIETY.)

AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY. (See BIBLE SOCIETY.)

AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS. This noble institution owes its origin to the circumstance that a number of young men, who had studied in Andover, Massachusetts, deeply impressed with a sense of the wretched state of the heathen world, determined to devote themselves to the work of their salvation. With this object in view, they were led to seek counsel and advice of the General Association of Congregational Ministers, at their annual session, at Bradford, Massachusetts, in June, 1810. To this body they presented the following paper:

"The undersigned, members of the divinity college, respectfully request the attention of their reverend fathers, convened in the general association at Bradford, to the following statement and inquiries.

"They beg leave to state, that their minds have been long impressed with the duty and importance of personally attempting a mission to the heathen; that the impressions on their minds have induced a serious, and they trust, a prayerful consideration of the subject, in its various attitudes, particularly in relation to the probable success, and the difficulties, attending such an attempt; and that, after examining all the information which they can obtain, they consider themselves as devoted to this work for life, whenever God, in his providence, shall open the way.

"They now offer the following inquiries, on which they solicit the opinion and advice of this association: Whether, with their present views and feelings, they ought to renounce the object of missions, as either visionary or impracticable; if not, whether they ought to direct their attention to the eastern, or the western world; whether they may expect patronage and support from a missionary society in this country, or must commit themselves to the direction of a European society; and what preparatory measures they ought to take previous to actual engagement.

"The undersigned, feeling their youth and inexperience, look up to their fathers in the church, and respectfully solicit their advice, direction and prayers.

The above paper was signed by Messrs. Adoiram Judson, Samuel J. Mills, Samuel Newell, and Samuel Nott.

The first meeting of the board was at Farmington, Connecticut, September, 1810, and its first officers were the Hon. John Treadwell, LL. D., president; the Rev. Samuel Worcester, D. D., corresponding secretary; Jeremiah Evarts, Esq., treasurer; and the Rev. Calvin Chapin, D. D., recording secretary. The board was incorporated June, 1812, by the legislature of Massachusetts—and its principal executive organ is the prudential committee. The present officers are the Hon. John Cotton Smith, LL. D., president; the Rev. Calvin Chapin, D. D., recording secretary; the Rev. Rufus Anderson, and Rev. David Green, secretaries; Henry Hill, Esq., treasurer; John Tappan, Esq., William J. Hubbard, Esq., auditors. The prudential committee are the Hon. William Reed, the Rev. Leonard Woods, D. D., Hon. Samuel Hubbard, LL. D., Rev. Warren Fay, D. D., Hon. Samuel T. Armstrong, and Mr. Charles Stoddard.

The first missionaries which left the country under the patronage of this board were destined for Calcutta. These were Messrs. Judson and Newell, who, with their wives, left Salem, February 19, 1812, in the Caravan. About the same time there sailed from Philadelphia, in the Harmony, three other missionaries, viz. Messrs. Hall, Nott, and Rice.

From this time, it was settled that the American board would be sustained in their operations. The enterprise was regarded with favor by the whole church, and the immediate superintendents of the mission felt encouraged to go forward, and to enlarge their operations in successive years.

At the present time the board occupies a distinguished rank among the benevolent institutions of the world. They have twelve missions under their care, in South-eastern Asia, at Bombay and Ceylon, in the countries around the Mediterranean, at the Sandwich Islands, and among the Indians of North America. (See Missionary Gazetteer.)

These missions, at the commencement of the present year, 1835, embraced sixty-two stations; ninety-six ordained missionaries; seven physicians not ordained; six printers; eighteen teachers; fifteen farmers and mechanics; 151 females, married and single—making a total of 293 laborers in heathen lands, dependent on the board and under its immediate direction. There were, also, five native preachers; thirty-nine native assistants; 1275 schools; and 39,824 scholars. The thirty churches gathered among the heathens, contain about 2360 members. Their printing presses have sent forth about 22,000,000 pages during the year; swelling the whole number from the beginning to $8,000,000 of pages in sixteen different languages.

ANTI-SLAVERY SOCIETIES. Among the voluntary philanthropic institutions for the removal of slavery, there are the African Institution, formed in London, April 7, 1807, directly after the act of parliament for abolishing slavery; and the Anti-Slavery society, formed also in London, January, 1823. Besides these there are other societies for the benefit of Africans, as the "Conversion of Negro Slaves Society," "England, the African Education Society of the United States," and the "New England Anti-Slavery Society."

The last named society (now Massachusetts Anti-Slavery Society) was formed in 1832. The second article of its constitution is, "The objects of this society shall be to endeavor by all means sanctioned by law, humanity, and religion, to effect the abolition of slavery in the United States; to improve the character and condition of the free people of color, to inform and correct public opinion in relation to their situation and rights, and to obtain for them, equal, civil, and political rights and privileges with the whites." It contemplates the establishment of an institution for the education of people of color, on the manual labor system. In 1833, the American Anti-Slavery society was formed in the city of New York. BAPTIST BOARD OF FOREIGN MISSIONS, AMERICAN. This Board was formed at Philadelphia, April, 1814, and owes its origin to the interest excited among the Baptists in the United States by the accession of Messrs. Judson and Rice to their denomination, who were sent out to India, with Mr. Newell and others, in 1812, by the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions.

The board holds its session triennially, and is composed of delegates from missionary societies, associations, and other religious bodies, and of individual annual contributors to its funds of a sum not less than one hundred dollars. An additional representation and vote are allowed for every additional one hundred dollars, which any individual may contribute. The officers of the board are, a president, eight vice-presidents, a corresponding and a recording secretary, a treasurer, an assistant treasurer, and forty managers. The board of managers have an annual meeting for mutual advice, and a monthly meeting at their missionary rooms in Boston, for the transaction of business requiring immediate attention. At the annual meeting eleven constitutes a quorum, and at the monthly meetings five.

For the present year, 1835, the officers of the society are, Rev. Jesse Mercer, D. D., president, the Rev. Lucius Bolles, D. D., corresponding secretary, and the Hon. Heman Lincoln, treasurer.

The board has missions under its care at Ava, Rangoon, Maulmein, Chumpherah, Mergui, and Tavoy, in Borneah; at Bankok, in Siam; at Liberia, in West Africa, and among several tribes of North American Indians. It has also a mission at Paris, in France, and at Hamburg, in Germany. The whole number of stations is 21; missionaries and assistants, 109; mission churches, 16; baptized on profession of faith, 1500. Receipts in 1834, $63,551. (See Missionary Gazetteer.)

BAPTIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY, ENGLISH. In 1792, the "Baptist Missionary Society" was formed, in consequence of Mr. (afterwards Dr.) Carey proposing to the Northamptonshire Association of Baptist ministers, "whether it were not practicable and obligatory to attempt the conversion of the heathen?" John Thomas had the singular honor of being the first Englishman who made known the gospel to the heathen Hindoos. Thomas was engaged as a missionary by the Baptists; and Carey also offered himself to go to India. They sailed in 1793, in a Danish East India man; but without funds. Thomas proposed to maintain himself by his profession; and Carey, by some occupation, till he could acquire the native language. Under difficulties extraordinary, with the assistance of Mr. Fountain, another missionary, they succeeded in translating the Scriptures into Bengalee. In 1799, they were reinforced by four more missionaries; but now they were refused permission to settle in the British territory. Carey and Fountain removed across the Ganges, sixteen miles from Calcutta, to Serampore, a Danish settlement; where, to his everlasting honor, the govern-nor protected and encouraged these men of God. Ever since, this has been the principal station of the Baptists in India. Kristnoo, the first Hindoo convert to Christianity, was baptized, with Felix Carey, eldest son of the doctor, in December, 1799, in the river Ganges, in the presence of a great concourse of people, Hindoos, Mohammedans, Europeans, and the Danish governor, who shed tears at the affecting sight. In seven years from the date of Kristnoo's baptism, one hundred and nine intelligent converts submitted to that ceremony. In 1806, there were ten English missionaries at Serampore; but to detail the labors of these devoted men, and the successes with which God favored them, would require many volumes. They toiled at labors in common; and labored for the common cause of the mission. Dr. Carey, by his learned labors at Calcutta, Dr. Marshman, by the school at Serampore, and Mr. Ward in the printing-office, have each contributed more than one thousand pounds per annum to the mission. The Baptists have many stations in different parts of India, Arracan, the West Indies, and other places, where their labors have been honored with many thousands of converts to the faith of Christ; but the most astonishing work of any body of Christians, in any age, is that of translating the Holy Scriptures. In 1806, they were printing the Scriptures at Serampore in six languages, and translating them into six more. In 1819, they were printing or translating the Word of God into twenty-seven languages, at Serampore or Calcutta! (See CAREY.)

Sinners the most base, and attacks the most virulent, have been made by party, prejudiced, unprincipled writers, upon these noble benefactors of mankind. But their heaven-born benevolence is manifested in their works, upon which the God of glory has placed the seal of his approbation; and their oriental learning has been proved to surpass that of any college in Christendom. Dr. Carey, especially, is admitted to be the first oriental scholar of our age. The calamities of their enemies have been deservedly exposed by Mr. Fuller, secretary of the society, by Dr. Buchanan, Mr. Wilberforce, lord Teignmouth, and Mr. W. Greenfield. (See Missionary Gazetteer.)—Timpson.

BIBLE SOCIETY, AMERICAN. This society was formed in the city of New York, in May, 1816. Its sole object, as stated in its constitution, is to encourage a wider circulation of the Holy Scriptures, without note or comment; and the only copies in the English language to be circulated by the society, are to be of the version now in use.

The society was formed by a convention of delegates, assembled for that purpose from various Bible societies, which then existed in different parts of the country. The whole number represented by delegates, regularly appointed, was twenty-nine, beside which, several were represented informally, by such of their number as were providentially present.

The convention was organized by choosing Joshua M. Wallace, Esq. president, and the Rev. J. B. Romeyn, D. D. and the Rev. Lyman Beecher, D. D., secretaries. The meeting was opened with prayer by the Rev. Eliphalet Nott, D. D. The convention first resolved on the expediency of forming, without delay, a general Bible institution for the circulation of the Holy Scriptures, and then appointed a committee to draft a constitution, and prepare an address to the public on the nature and objects of the society.

The officers of the society are, a president, twenty-three vice-presidents, a secretary of foreign correspondence, a secretary of domestic correspondence, and a treasurer. The first president was the Hon. John Bowditch, LL. D.; the first secretary, the Rev. Dr. J. M. Mason, and the Rev. Dr. J. B. Romeyn; and the first treasurer, Richard Varick, Esq.

The officers of the society, for the year 1835, are the Hon. John Cotton Smith, LL. D., president. The Rev. James Milnor, D. D., secretary of foreign correspondence. The Rev. Thomas M'Anley, D. D., the Rev. Charles G. Somers, and the Rev. John C. Brigham, secretaries of domestic correspondence. Mr. Robert F. Winslow, recording secretary and accountant. Hubert Van Wagener, Esq., treasurer, and John Ritchie, Esq., general agent and assistant treasurer.

Until the year 1833, the operations of the society had been chiefly confined to the United States; but at the annual meeting of the society, May, 1833, a series of resolutions were brought forward to extend the theatre of its influence, and which gives promise of sending the Word of Life to the now benighted nations of the world.

The first three of these resolutions were as follows:

Resolved, That the society regard it as an evident and most important duty, and will endeavor as far as possible, with the blessing of Divine Providence, and by the aid of its auxiliaries and patrons, to continue and enlarge its foreign operations, and with a view especially to supply the inhabitants around the Mediterranean, as well as those unevangelized communities in which missions from the different religious denominations of this country are established.

Resolved, That in view of the responsibility resting upon Christians, for the universal diffusion of the Sacred Scriptures throughout the world, and the constantly opening prospects which Divine Providence is affording for the prosecution and accomplishment of this great work, it is highly desirable that all the existing national Bible societies should, without delay, confer together on the best means of more rapidly advancing the great cause committed to their charge.

Resolved, That the board of managers of this society be authorized and requested to enter, forthwith, upon a special correspondence with the British and Foreign Bible Society, the Protestant Bible Society of Paris, and such other Bible societies as they may think proper, on this interesting subject.

From the report of this great society for the year 1833, we learn that the number of auxiliaries was 848; fourteen having been added during the year, among which are some composed of females and of young men, which promise to be efficient co-workers in the sacred cause.

Receipts.—The receipts of the year, from all sources, amount to 84,935 dollars and forty-eight cents, of which sum, 37,464 dollars and thirty-seven cents were received in payment for books; 4,190 dollars and fifty-seven cents from legacies; 8,572 dollars and fifty-three cents as donations toward the late general supply; 13,227 dollars and sixty cents for the distribution of the Scriptures in foreign countries; 22,070 dollars and ninety-six cents as ordinary donations; and the remainder from other sources.

English Bibles, . . . . .	35,459
English Testaments, . . . . .	52,543
French Bibles, . . . . .	260
French Testaments, . . . . .	218
Spanish Bibles, . . . . .	485
Spanish Testaments, . . . . .	637
German Bibles, . . . . .	676
German Testaments, . . . . .	293
Welsh Bibles, . . . . .	78
Welsh Testaments, . . . . .	432
Irish and Gaelic Testaments, . . . . .	13
Indian Gospels and Epistles, . . . . .	12
	91,168

Making a total of 91,168, and an aggregate, since the formation of the society, of one million, five hundred and thirty-three thousand six hundred and sixty-eight.

The printing done by the society, during the year 1833, was less than in previous years, principally owing to the large supply of Bibles on hand. Plates are prepared for three new Bibles with marginal references, and also for the New Testament in modern Greek.

General Supply.—This supply, which was entered upon in consequence of the resolution of the society to that effect in 1829, though not completed, has still been carried as far as was probably to be expected, considering the extent and difficulty of the work, especially in the newly settled parts of the country. Not far from half a million of Bibles have been issued since the commencement of this undertaking, and which have gone to the south and west, and to a great extent gratuitously. The friends of the Bible, in many portions of the country which have been once supplied, are exploring them again, and supplying the destitutions which are found. These, owing to the increase of population and other causes, are often unexpectedly great.

Attempts are also making, in some parts of the country, to supply every Sunday school scholar with a copy of the New Testament. To encourage this the Sunday school New Testament is now sold by the society for nine cents, and the Bible for forty-five.

Agencies.—The society are endeavoring to obtain permanent agents, to be located and to act in the several portions of the country. Five or six such agents have been secured to occupy some of the most important fields.

Gratuitous Distributions.—These amounted, during the year 1833, to 6,192 dollars, and sixty-seven cents; being for 8,806 Bibles, and 2,006 Testaments in the English language, and 527 Bibles, and 668 Testaments, in foreign languages. Many Bibles and Testaments have been distributed among soldiers at various military posts, and among seamen at home and abroad, partly through auxiliary societies; some of which have been given as a gratuity, and others sold at reduced prices.

Foreign Distributions.—This is calling forth much of the attention and resources of the society. The sum of 15,000 dollars was appropriated to this work the previous year. The managers resolved, in 1833, "that it is expedient to attempt to raise 30,000 dollars for this work the current year;" most of which is to be used for printing the Scriptures in heathen languages, under the direction of missionaries of different denominations of Christians.—Goodrich's Church Library, BOOK SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING RELIGIOUS KNOWLEDGE AMONG THE POOR. In 1750, the "Book Society for Promoting Religious Knowledge among the Poor" was formed in England by benevolent persons, both dissenters and churchmen. The design of this society was to circulate, at the lowest possible price, Bibles, hymn-books, catechisms, and tracts, and the standard writings of the most eminent authors of different denominations of Christians, excluding their peculiarities of church policy or modes of worship. The names of Doddridge and Hervey are found in the early annals of this society, as some of its most active and liberal supporters, affording a pledge of a still more extensive union between churchmen and dissenters in the work of God. The operations of this institution have been incalculably increased in circulating the best religious works among the poor, at the lowest prices. Notwithstanding other societies, the issues of its valuable publications are greater now than at any former period of its existence. The receipts of this society, for the year ending December, 1829, as reported, were 1653 pounds, nine shillings, and one penny, and from its commencement up to that period, 67,152 pounds, thirteen shillings, and one penny.—Timpsen's Church Library.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY. In 1804, the "British and Foreign Bible Society" was instituted. This venerated society originated in the endeavors of the Rev. Thomas Charles, of Bala, the principal leader of the Calvinistic Methodists in Wales, to supply his countrymen with the Holy Scriptures in their native language. The subject being mentioned at a committee meeting of the Religious Tract Society, its secretary, the Rev. Mr. Hughes, suggested the idea of a general society for supplying the world with Bibles. The friends present approving the proposition, measures were taken to call a public meeting, which, on the 7th of March, 1804, was held at the London tavern, consisting of about three hundred persons of different denominations, including some worthy Quakers. For the purpose of carrying their resolutions into effect, it was deemed advisable to seek the ratification of some persons of rank. Dr. Porteus, then bishop of London, yielded to the application, and gave his cordial sanction; and recommended lord Teignmouth as president; an office which that distinguished nobleman till his death held with honor. Several other prelates gave their names, which were enrolled on the list of presidents. The Rev. Joseph Hughes, A. M., a Baptist minister, and its original promoter; the Rev. Josiah Pratt, M. D., of the church of England; and the Rev. Charles F. A. Steinkopf, M. D., minister of the Lutheran chapel in London, were appointed secretaries. The fundamental law of the society declares its title as given above; and, also, that its object is exclusively to promote the circulation of the Holy Scriptures, without note or comment, both at home and abroad; and, further, that the copies circulated in the United Kingdom, in the English language, shall be those only the authorized version. The constitution of this society admits of the co-operation of all persons who are disposed to concur in its support; and it is ordained that the proceedings of this society shall be conducted by a committee, consisting of thirty-six laymen, six of whom shall be foreigners residing in London and its vicinity; half of the remainder members of the church of England, and the other half members of other denominations of Christians. The presidents, and all clergymen and dissenting ministers, subscribing to the society, may vote at the meetings of the committee. The British and Foreign Bible Society has had many enemies; especially among the high church clergy of the establishment, and not more than about a sixth part of its prelates and clergy have, at any time, been reckoned among its friends. But to detail its history would require volumes. It has been the means of originating similar institutions in most parts of the world in which the Bible is believed, conveying immortal blessings to all nations. Either in England or in foreign countries, directly at the expense of the society, or indirectly by grants to societies abroad, or to individuals, this astonishing institution has reprinted the Holy Scriptures in forty-four languages; in five languages it has printed translations of the Scriptures in seventy-two languages and dialects in which they never had previously been printed; and in thirty-two new translations commenced or completed; making a total of 153 different languages and dialects!

The receipts of the year 1833, were 81,735 pounds, sixteen shillings, and four pence, being almost 400,000 dollars. In respect to the operations of other continental societies, it may be stated that the distributions of the Paris Bible Society, being confined exclusively to Protestants, are not very extensive. The committee, however, manifest a willingness to furnish Bibles to all who make their wants known. Offering the past year to furnish gratuitously a copy of the Bible to every newly married couple, and a Testament to every new communicant, 1,434 of the former, and 3,588 of the latter were distributed. The distribution of the Scriptures amounted to 11,948 copies, making, with those previously distributed by the society, 130,000.

The Geneva Bible Society has put in circulation 19,921 Bibles and Testaments, including an edition of the modern Greek New Testament, which has been sent in Greece. The Basle Bible Society has circulated, in all, 161,575 copies. In one canton in Switzerland, containing 170,000 inhabitants, every family has been furnished with a copy.

The Prussian Bible Society, and its auxiliaries, distributed last year 9,367 Bibles, and 27,507 New Testaments; making a circulation, in seventeen years, of 530,000 copies.

The Netherlands Bible Society has established an auxiliary at Surinam, in South America; and measures are in train for publishing, at Java, parts of the Old Testament in Javanese, the New Testament having been already published by the Batavia Bible Society.

In Sweden, the Bible cause is highly prosperous. Last year, 8,000 Bibles and 22,500 Testaments were printed by the Swedish Bible Society, making in all, since the formation of the society, 241,787 copies. The same measures are still at work, preparing for future demands.

The Danish Bible Society circulated, last year, 3,212 copies, making its total issues 120,417.

From St. Petersburg, in Russia, were distributed, last year, 5,823 Testaments, making, since 1828, the number of 22,000 copies. Most of these books were the rev. in circulation through the exertions of that devoted minister, the Rev. M. Knitl.

From Malta, 4,261 copies of the Scriptures were issued the past year, principally in French, Italian, Arabic, Greek, and Hebrew. A part of these books went to Algiers and other places, on the north coast of Africa.

The translation of the Old Testament into modern Greek is rapidly going forward in Greece, under the direction of Mr. Levees, the Bible agent, the Rev. Dr. Jewett, and others. The number of new Testaments issued by Mr. Levees, in the course of the past year, were 2,288.

The issues from Constantinople and Smyrna by the agent, Mr. Barker, during the same period, amounted to 5,484 copies. Many of the copies were procured for schools.

A large number of Bibles and Testaments, in Arabic, Syriac, and Turkish, or portions of them, have been sent to Shoosha, in Armenia, to be distributed by the missionaries located in that region. Measures were taken to print the Armenian New Testament at this place, but the work has since been transferred to Moscow, where it is in press, and the gospel of Matthew already issued.

The Bible Society of Calcutta is still in active operation. The issues from its depository, the past year, amounted to 14,661 copies. Efforts are made to circulate portions of the word of God in the interior cities and villages, and with encouraging success.

The Bible Society at Malras has undertaken to print 12,000 copies of the New Testament in Tamul, as soon as the translation is completed.

The distributions of the Madras Bible Society, for the year, were 19,324 copies, in whole or in part, and in no less than fifteen different languages.—Timpson's Ch. His.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN SCHOOL SOCIETY. In 1805, the "British and Foreign School Society" was instituted. This most noble institution, the design of which is the "education of the laboring and manufacturing classes of society, of every religious persuasion," arose out of the zealous exertions of Joseph Lancaster, an ingenious schoolmaster of London, and who is generally considered the inventor of the system of mutual instruction. His own exertions were surprising; and he soon after opened a school in the metropolis, and found that there of Kent and Sussex. A society was formed in 1805, and a noble building for a model school was erected in Southwark, and schools were soon established in different parts of the kingdom upon the same plan. It is a law of this society, that the schools in connexion with "shall be open to the children of parents of all denominations: the lessons for reading shall consist of extracts from the Holy Scriptures; no catechism or peculiar religious tenets shall be taught in the schools, but every child shall be enjoined to attend regularly the place of worship to which its parents belong." As no preference was given to the peculiarities of the church of England, and no provision made for the use of its catechism, prejudices and opposition were excited, by certain intolerant alarmists of the church of England. It was said to be an engine for the multiplication of dissenters; but this prejudice was proved for good, as churchmen were roused to take part in the education of the poor, by the formation of national schools. These were therefore established in very many parishes through the kingdom, in which it is reported, there are now about 280,000 scholars taught on a similar plan, somewhat modified by Dr. Bell, but who recently returned from Madras. In these schools the church catechism is used.

The report of the British and Foreign School Society, for the year ending May, 1831, appears to be one of the most interesting documents of the kind ever published; exhibiting its various branch operations, not only in England and the colonies of Great Britain, but in many states of Europe, Asia, Africa, America, and the islands of the Great South sea, with the general state of education in those countries. From this society have originated, not only the national schools, but many others in different parts of the world, among which we must mention the "Society for Promoting the Education of the Poor in Ireland," called the Dublin "Kildare-Street Society," which had, in 1829, 1,653 schools on its list, containing 124,449 scholars. This society has received a grant of money annually from parliament.—Timpson.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN TEMPERANCE SOCIETY. (See TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.)

BRITISH SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING THE RELIGIOUS PRINCIPLES OF THE REFORMATION. In 1828, was formed, "the British Society for Promoting the Religious Principles of the Reformation." This society has a special regard to the prevalence of the Roman Catholic profession in England and Ireland; and it proposes, by education, Scripture readers, miscellaneous publications, and public or local lectures, to excite public attention to the controversy, to diffuse information on the subject, and thus to destroy the influence of the priests, and convert the Catholic population to the doctrines of the Holy Scriptures. How much better is this than persecution! The receipts of the society, for 1830, were 2,984 pounds.—Timpson.

CHRISTIAN INSTRUCTION SOCIETY. In 1825, the "Christian Instruction Society" was formed. It originated with some benevolent dissenting ministers in London, who deeply felt the degradation of thousands of its inhabitants. On a survey it was found that there were only 430 places of worship in the metropolis, half of which belong to the dissenters; and that supposing they were attended by an average of 1,000 persons each, which was far from being the fact, yet even then there would be about a million of the inhabitants without the means of grace! A society, therefore, was formed by the principal dissenters, to carry forward an organized system of visiting the laborers and courts and wretched districts of the metropolis, to establish prayer meetings, Sunday schools, and preaching places; and especially to distribute religious tracts, by weekly loans. Many of the congregations in London have adopted the plans of this society, and the most signal tokens of the divine blessing have attended these labors of love and visits of mercy. The report for the year ending May, 1831, states, that "at the present time there are sixty-five associations, which engage the benevolent attention of 1,173 gratuitous visitors, who have, during the past year, visited 31,591 families. So that, by your voluntary agency alone, religious tracts and books are now placed within the reach of at least 150,000 individuals." "Immediately connected with the numerous associations, are to be found ninety-three stations for reading the Scriptures and prayer." This society employs a city missionary, whose labors have been incalculably beneficial. Many of the most eminent ministers in the metropolis have co-operated in outdoor preaching, in texts, and in lectures to mechanics on the most important subjects. Valuable tracts, &c. are published by this society, whose plans have been adopted in many cities and towns both in England and Ireland. Its expenditure, for the year, was 1,437 pounds, ten shillings, and eleven pence.—Timpson's Ch. His.

CHRISTIAN KNOWLEDGE SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING. (See SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING CHRISTIAN KNOWLEDGE.)

CHRISTIAN KNOWLEDGE SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING IN THE HIGHLANDS AND ISLANDS OF SCOTLAND. In 1793, at Edinburgh, there was formed the "Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge in the Highlands and Islands of Scotland." This was sanctioned by the general assembly, and collections were made for its support. Copies of the proposed plans being circulated, large subscriptions were afforded, and Queen Anne issued her royal proclamation in its favor, and her letters patent, under the great seal of Scotland, for erecting it into a corporation. Schools in the Highlands, and various other means were employed, but they found assistance also in the Scotchman and Delaware Indians in America. Braden was one of their missionaries, or greatly supported by them; and his itinerant labors, and evangelical success, in bringing guilty men to embrace the salvation of Jesus Christ, have scarcely ever been surpassed.—Timpson.

CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY. In 1800, the Church Mission Society was organized. Aided by who assist the active zeal of other denominations of Christians, several pious churchmen united to form this institution, for the extension of the gospel under the forms of the church of England. This society manifested but little zeal for several years; and, being discontinued by the prelates and dignitaries of the church, its labors were inconsiderable. Two missionaries were at length obtained from Germany, and they departed from England to Western Africa, in March, 1801. Three more were sent forth in 1803. The Sierra Leone country and the Bullonshore, in the neighborhood of Sierra Leone, were the first stations of this society; but both were afterwards abandoned, and the mission established at Sierra Leone. In 1809, two missionaries were sent to New Zealand, at the recommendation of Mr. Marsden, chaplain of New South Wales. Before 1811, the efforts of this society had been exceedingly inefficient; but in that year, the Rev. Melville Horne, late chaplain to the colony of Sierra Leone, preached the annual sermon before the society, from which it appears, that not one Englishman had engaged in the work. He says, "Sorry am I to say that the clergy, and the clergy alone, decline the cross! When not one clergyman will arise in the cause of the Redeemer, what is to be said? Have you, my honored brethren, in Africa, in the East, one English clergyman who serves as a missionary?" Having then directed his hearers to contemplate the zeal of the dissenters, he appeals to them,—"Have Carey and the Baptists had more forgiven than we, that they should love more? Have the fervent Methodists and patient Moravians been extortionate publicans, that they should expound their all in a cause which we decline? Have our independent brethren persecuted the church, that they should be now much more zealous in propagating the faith which they once destroyed?" The appeal was not in vain; the Church Missionary society has, since that period, been making considerable progress; having not only German agents, but many Englishmen, who receive ordination from the bishop of London, as his diocese is regarded as extending to most of the foreign colonies. Much attention has been directed by this society to schools in India; where Messrs. a converted Mohammedan, began scriptural instruction, under the direction of Mr. Grieve, a chaplain of Calcutta, in 1812. In 1814, two German missionaries were sent from England to Madras, and from that period others have been sent successively to various places. The schools established by this society have engaged the greater degree of the attention of its agents; and they have been of incalculable benefit to the rising generation. In their labors, this society has four worthy coadjutors in some of the chaplains of the East India company, and in some others; yet still, the cumbrous machinery of the church of England is observed to be ill adapted to the missionary cause; and the successes of this society have not been answered equal to what might have been expected from its expenditure.—Timpson.

COLONIZATION SOCIETY, AMERICAN. The principal originators of this society, were the late Dr. Finley, of New Jersey, Rev. Samuel J. Mills, Gen. Mercer, of Virginia, and a few others of a kindred spirit. Its object is, as its name imports, and as is mentioned in the second article, to be the constitution, to promote, and execute a plan of colonization (with their consent) of the free people of color residing in our country, in Africa, or such other place as congress shall deem most expedient." The income of the society is about 50,000 dollars annually, and it has received the approbation and countenance, not only of distinguished individuals, but of most of the state governments throughout the Union. Application for assistance has been made to the general government, but none has yet been granted. Another society has been formed in sixteen states, and Maryland has granted 200,000 dollars from her state treasury, to enable her free blacks to remove to Africa. The society have succeeded in forming a colony on the western coast of Africa, which is in a prosperous condition, as the society represents. The territory procured extends 200 miles on the coast, and 140 in the interior. The population of the colony is about 400, and is constantly increasing. A system of government, and also of education, has been established. Churches are provided for religious worship.

The expense of an emigrant's passage to Liberia is by some estab-

matel at twenty dollars; by others from twenty-five to thirty-five dollars. Manumissions have been numerous, and are increasing. Still the slave-trade is active, notwithstanding all that has been done to suppress it. Not less than 50,000 Africans, it is said, were carried into slavery in 1831.—Hon. James Madison, president; Rev. R. R. Gurley, secretary; Richard Smith, Esq., treasurer. The seat of its operations is the District of Columbia.—Cogswell's Harbinger of the Millennium.

CONTINENTAL SOCIETY. In 1818, the "Continental Society" was formed, the object of which is stated to be, "to assist local native ministers in preaching the gospel, and in distributing Bibles, Testaments, and religious publications over the continent of Europe; not without the desire of establishing any distinct sect or party." That the acknowledgment of the doctrine of the Holy Trinity be indispensable to constitute a member of this society; and that governors, and clergymen, and dissenting ministers, who are members of this society, be entitled to attend and vote at all meetings of the committee." There is difficulty in exhibiting a statement of the operations of the Continental society, because a measure of secrecy is required, on account of the jealousy of the European governments. Its agency, however, is considerable, and its expenditure in the year ending April, 1831, was 2,308 pounds, nineteen shillings, and seven pence.

CONTINENTAL SOCIETY, BAPTIST. This society was formed in London, June 22<sup>d</sup> 1831. It originated in the belief that a society which would effectually operate in spreading the gospel, should have missionaries qualified to administer ordinances and establish churches. The present number of laborers employed on the continent by this society is not known.—Allen's Bap. Register.

DANISH SOCIETY FOR SENDING MISSIONARIES TO INDIA. In 1705, a "Society for sending Missionaries to India" was established by Frederic IV., king of Denmark, at the suggestion of one his chaplains. The design was to make known the gospel of Christ among the Malabar Indians on the coast of Coromandel. Application was made to the celebrated professor Frank, for suitable agents educated under him at Halle. The mission in reality had partly originated with him, and two young men of sound learning and apostolic piety were found ready to enter upon the work of their Savior. Bartholomew Zeigenbalg and Henry Plutschow were the first missionaries. On their voyage these devoted men studied the Portuguese and the Malabar languages, and were soon enabled to commence preaching to the natives; some of whom, in a short period, embraced the gospel of Christ. They prepared a dictionary and grammar in the Malabar language, into which they succeeded in translating the New Testament. These they printed, with many other books which they composed for their followers. This mission received great support from the English society for the Propagation of the Gospel, by whom a printing establishment was furnished, with a German printer. Our limits will allow us only to say, they were eminently and extensively useful. Schwartz was one of their most distinguished missionaries. (See SCHWARTZ.)—Timpson's Ch. His.

EDUCATION SOCIETY, (AMERICAN.) This society, which is the first of its class, owes its origin to the pressure which was felt in consequence of the necessity of a greater and more rapid supply of "pious and learned ministers." The first meeting in relation to it was held in Boston, July, 1815, and consisted, besides "the few individuals" who called it, of the clergymen of the neighboring towns. It was principally for consultation, and resulted only in the conclusion, that it was best to have a society, and in the appointment of a committee of six clergymen and four laymen to draft a constitution, and report at an adjourned meeting, to be held in Boston the August following. Accordingly, August 23, 1815, the meeting assembled, composed of about 100. At this time the American Education society was formed. The first reception of beneficiaries was in March, 1816. The society was incorporated the 4th of December following. Since this time it has been its purpose to suffer no young man worthy and desirous of its patronage, and willing to receive it according to its rules, to fail of an education through want of pecuniary means.

The plan of the society as to the conditions on which beneficiaries have been allowed to receive its assistance, has undergone some changes in the progress of experience, till now it is believed to be as nearly perfect as, considering the nature of the case, it probably ever will be. Its first plan was to furnish money to beneficiaries without any obligation to refund it either in whole or in part. In 1820, it required an obligation to refund one half the amount received; and since 1826, it has required an obligation to refund the whole, and that with interest, after a suitable time in which to pay it, subsequent to the completion of the beneficiary's education, and his entrance on the active duties of his profession.

In 1826, it was found necessary to secure the whole services of some one to the interests of the society, and the Rev. Elias Cornelius was elected its permanent secretary and general agent. The whole number of beneficiaries assisted by the society up to that time was 341, and the total receipts $121,769.

In 1827, the Presbyterian Education society became connected with the American Education society, and two general agencies were established, one at Cincinnati, Ohio, and the other at Hudson, in the same state. In 1828, the compass of the society's patronage, which had hitherto been confined to beneficiaries in the academic and collegiate course only, was extended so as to accommodate the necessities of students alike in all the several stages of education from the commencement to the close of their studies.

There are branch societies in various parts of the country. The society is wholly catholic in its principle; bestowing patronage on all of evangelical sentiments, who, in accordance with its rules, and with suitable qualifications, apply for its assistance.—Cogswell's Harbinger of the Millennium.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY'S BOARD OF MISSIONS. The general assembly of the Presbyterian church has a board of missions, formed in 1813. Its principal operations are domestic. In 1832, the number of its missionaries was 226, who had performed, in all, 154 years of labor. The number of Sabbath schools in the congregations, assisted by the board, is from 12,000 to 15,000. This is the more interesting, as these congregations are principally in the southern and western parts of our country. Hopeful conversions, during the year, were 2,000. The amount of funds employed by the board was 20,132 dollars and twenty-one cents.—Cogswell's Harbinger.

GENERAL TRACT SOCIETY, BAPTIST. This society was organized at the city of Washington, February 25, 1824. In December, 1826, the society removed the seat of its operations to Philadelphia, on account of the facilities there afforded for immediate and ready transportation to the depositories and societies in every part of the Union. Its receipts in 1834 were 6,126 dollars. It has already published about 27 million pages of tracts.

The following exhibits a brief view of the society's progress, from its formation, in 1824, to December 1, 1832:—

GENERAL UNION FOR THE OBSERVANCE OF THE SABBATH. In May, 1828, a convention of ministers and distinguished laymen, from different parts of the country, convened at New York for the purpose, formed a society under this name. The object was to secure in this way the co-operation of all the friends of the Sabbath throughout the country, in one continued effort to raise the sanctity of the day, and cause it, among Christians at least, to be better observed.—Cogswell's Harbinger of the Millennium.

H.

HOME MISSION SOCIETY, (AMERICAN BAPTIST.) This society was organized April 27, 1832, in the city of New York. Its great object is declared to be the preaching of the gospel to every creature in our country. Its chief attention at present is directed to the wide-spread valley of the west. All the executive business of the society is performed by a committee appointed by the officers and laid directors.

Any annual contribution constitutes a member; thirty dollars a member for life; and one hundred dollars a director for life. The Baptist state conventions and domestic missionary societies, throughout the United States, have been auxiliary, and co-operate with it. The first year $10,000 were contributed, and about fifty missionaries employed. In 1834, ninety-two missionaries and agents were employed, and the society's resources were increasing. Hon. Heman Lincoln, of Boston, is president, Rev. Jonathan Going, D. D. secretary, and William Colgate, treasurer. The centre of its operations is in the city of New York.—Allen's U. S. Baptist Annual Register.

HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY, (BAPTIST.) In 1797, the "Baptist Home Missionary Society" was formed, to supply the destitute villages of Britain with the means of evangelical instruction; and its labors have been great and prosperous. The society has progressively advanced. Its report for 1830 states, that the Baptist home missionary society "supports, in a great degree, thirty-six missionaries, and it extends aid to more than fifty itinerant and village preachers, whose voices are heard from the principality of Wales to the opposite shore; and from the Land's End almost to the Orkneys." The same report mentions 236 Sunday schools supported on the Home Missionary stations of this society. The expenditure of this society, in its operations for the year ending May, 1830, was about $9,000.—Timpson.

HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY, (ESCHER.) In 1819, the "Home Missionary Society" was instituted. Its design is the "Evangelization of the unenlightened inhabitants of the towns and villages of Great Britain, by preaching the gospel, the distribution of religious tracts, and the establishment of prayer meetings and Sunday schools, with every other scriptural method for the accomplishment of this important object." The necessity for the Home Missionary society is evident to every intelligent Christian, and amply proved by the remarkable documents in its reports, and from the clerical testimonies in the "review of England in the nineteenth century." To detail the beneficial operations of this society, is altogether impossible in this place, but it appears to have the strongest claims upon the patriots of Britain. It has received the generous support of some pious members of the church of England, and from several of the evangelical clergy. The report for the year ending March, 1831, states, "the society employs thirty-five missionaries; in addition to whom, there are about twenty pastors and stated ministers, who devote a portion of their time to the objects of this society. There are, in all, sixty agents, who employ every practicable mode of communicating religious instruction, in schools, by the distribution of tracts, and by regular preaching. They have 260 villages, and not fewer than 2000 children under their care, in a population of nearly 200,000 souls. Appeals the most affecting are continually being made, from destitute hamlets of the country, for evangelical laborers; by which the society has been induced to exceed their funds. The treasurer has received, during the past year, 4,900 mites, and four shillings, and paid 4,900 pounds; but the society is still indebted not less than 700 pounds. God has graciously blessed the operations of the Home Missionary society, so that many flourishing churches have been formed, some of whom support their own pastors without any pecuniary aid from the society; but its claims upon the liberality of British Christian patriots are urgent and imperative, to assist in recovering the peasantry from that state of ignorance and crime, which is fearfully developed by the country gaols and prisons, and special commissions."

HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETIES, (AMERICAN.) The Connecticut Missionary society was formed June 21, 1798. By the general association of the state, that body constitutes itself the Missionary society of Connecticut. The great field of its operations has been the Ohio, called New Connecticut, or the Western Reserve. It has assisted in establishing about 400 churches.

In 1799, the Massachusetts Missionary society was established. In 1816, the Domestic Missionary society was formed; but was united to the former in 1827. The United society is now auxiliary to the American Home Missionary society.

The American Home Missionary society was formed in New York, May 10, 1826. It was instituted with the concurrence of other domestic missionary societies, and sustains the general character of a parent institution to them all.

The whole number of ministers employed by this society, during the year (1832-1833) according to its annual report, was 606, which is an increase of ninety-nine since last year. These have labored, either as missionaries or agents, in 801 congregations, missionary districts, or fields of agency, in twenty-one of the United States and territories, and in the provinces of Upper and Lower Canada; 411 being settled as pastors, or employed as stated supplies in single congregations; 137 extending their labors to two or three congregations each; and fifty-eight, including agents, being employed on large fields.

Of the missionaries and agents thus employed, 397 were in commission at the commencement of the year; 241 of whom have been re-appointed, and are still in the service of the society. The remaining 209 have been new appointments since the last anniversary; making, in all, 606.

The amount of ministerial labor reported as having been performed, within the year, is 416 years and nine months.

The number reported as added, within the year, to the churches aided, has been 6041; viz. 1757 by letter, and 4284 by examination, on profession of their faith.

One hundred and one of the churches aided have been blessed with special revivals of religion; and the number of hopeful conversions reported, (the larger portion of whom are not embraced in the reported additions to the churches,) is 3435; making the probable number of conversions, under the labors of these missionaries within the year, about 7000.

The number of Sabbath schools sustained, during the whole or a part of the year, under the ministry of these missionaries, is 770; embracing 31,140 scholars.

The number of Bible classes reported, as conducted by the missionaries themselves, has been 378; embracing 11,195 pupils of all ages.

The number of subscribers to the principle of entire abstinence from the use of intoxicating drinks, reported in the congregations aided, is 53,746, which is 17,344 more than the number reported last year.

It appears that the missionaries of this society have increased, in seven years, from 169 to 606, and the congregations and missionary districts annually aided in their support, have increased from 195 to 861. These missionaries have labored in the service of the society, the full amount of 1775 years. Under their ministry, 17,579 souls have been reported as added to the churches, on profession of their faith, within the last six years. They have also reported, each year, from 10,000 to 31,495 children instructed in Sabbath schools, and from 2000 to 11,080 in Bible classes; while, according to their ability, they have been efficient helpers in every good work which has claimed the attention of the benevolent on the fields of their labor.

It may be added to the foregoing, that Maine, Vermont, New Hampshire, and some other states, have efficient home missionary societies within their limits. All the societies above named are Congregationalists. The general association of the Presbyterian church has also a board of missions, formed in 1818. Its principal operations are domestic. In 1832 the number of its missionaries was 226, who had performed, in all, 154 years of labor. The number of Sabbath schools in the congregations, assisted by the board, is from 12,000 to 15,000. This is the more interesting, as these congregations are principally in the more remote and western parts of our country. Hopeful conversions, during the year, were 2000. The amount of funds employed by the board was 20,132 dollars.—Cogswell.

IRISH EVANGELICAL SOCIETY. In 1814, the "Irish Evangelical Society" was formed in London. The design of it is declared to be "to promote the preaching of the gospel in Ireland, by maintaining an evangelical academy for the education of native and other students, and by assisting pastors and itinerant preachers in the various and important labors of the Christian ministry." The fundamental principle of this society is declared to be, that "as its sole desire is to enlarge the kingdom of our Savior, it will not direct its exertions to the exaltation of sects, or the establishment of parties; but will leave to the congregations that may be collected, the choice of their own mode of worship, and the formation of their own churches." This society has been the means of extensive and incalculable good, in educating pious young men for the ministry, and in supporting them while laboring to gather churches in different parts of the country. The report of the year ending 31st Dec. 1831, states, "the society's agents are fifty-seven; nine pastors of churches, who perform itinerant services; fifteen ministers, entirely supported by the funds of the society, and constantly engaged in its service; eleven missionaries, in the English or Irish language, who travel through extensive districts; and twenty-two Scripture readers and expositors, chiefly engaged in a course of domestic Christian instruction. The agents last named are chiefly employed in connexion with the former, to whom they prove the most valuable auxiliaries." The expenditure of the past year was 3759 pounds, six shillings, and five pence. The society has a committee of management in Dublin.—Timpson.

IRISH SOCIETY. In 1816, the "Irish Society" was formed, the design of which is "to instruct the native Irish, who still use their vernacular language, how to employ it as the means for obtaining an accurate knowledge of English; and for this end, as also for their amelioration, to distribute among them the Irish version of the Scriptures by archbishop Doael and bishop Bedell, the Irish Prayer Book where acceptable, and such other books as may be necessary for school-books."—Timpson.

IRISH SOCIETY, (BAPTIST.) In 1814, the "Baptist Irish Society" was instituted for promoting the gospel in Ireland, by employing itinerants, establishing schools, and distributing Bibles and tracts, either gratuitously or at reduced prices. Great success has attended the operations of this society up to this period; 100,000 children and adults have been taught to read the Scriptures; and the report of the year ending May, 1831, states, "that in the evening schools for adults more than 700 men have, during the past winter, been taught to read the Scriptures in Irish or English. The number of scholars now amounts to upwards of 8000." There are fifty Irish Scripture readers, and six English ministers in Ireland, in the service of the society, and during the year the agents of the society have distributed 1630 English and Irish Bibles and Testaments, besides first and second spelling-books in the schools, amounting to 4899 copies. The expenditure of the year was about $4,000.—Timpson.

IRISH SOCIETY OF LONDON. In 1832, the "Irish Society of London" was formed, as an auxiliary to the Irish society of Dublin; besides which, some attention has been paid to the native Irish residing in London; and in June, 1830, a public meeting was held to establish the Irish society's charity fund. The receipts of this society, for the year ending April, 1830, were 1532 pounds, five shillings, and two pence.

JEWES, SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING CHRISTIANITY AMONG THE. In 1808, the "Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews" was formed. It was instituted by several devoted ministers and private Christians of different denominations, under the patronage of the duke of Kent. Its labors were manifestly sanctioned by the God of Abraham, in blessing the invitations to the Hebrews to behold Jesus Christ as the promised Messiah. Schools were established in Spital-fields, London, and the Jews' chapel was opened in that vicinity. In 1813, the Episcopal chapel was erected in Bethnal Green, attached to which various other buildings were raised, for the more convenient prosecution of the desired objects. But the society being heavily in debt, several affluent churchmen, engaged to take the whole responsibility, if the dissenters would relinquish their claims upon a share of its direction; to which they consented. The society is now supported principally by members of the church of England, having two of the bishops for patrons. They have a missionary seminary, in which "there have been five students during the past year. The present number of missionaries, in immediate connexion with the society, is thirty, besides three, who are engaged in India under the inspection of the Madras committee. Of these, ten are of the Jewish nation. There are, also, five other individuals, at present, engaged as teachers in the Jewish schools in the grand duchy of Posen; making a total of thirty-eight missionary agents engaged in promoting the objects of this society." The principal fields of missionary labor, besides England, are various parts of Europe, where Jews are numerous. The total receipts of this society, during the past year, were 11,144 pounds, seven shillings, and nine pence. But it has been liberally assisted by grants of Hebrew Bibles and Testaments from the British and Foreign Bible Society. (See the article Jews.—Timpson; Goodrich's Church History.)

LADIES' HIBERNIAN FEMALE SCHOOL SOCIETY. In 1823, the "Ladies' Hibernian Female School Society" commenced. Scriptural instruction is the course pursued by this society; and its benefits have been remarkably great, not only in sowing the seed of God's word, but in the arising conversion of some to the knowledge and faith of Christ. The report for the year 1831 states, "the number of children in the schools is 11,470, of which there is about an equal number of Roman Catholics and Protestants." The expenditure of the society, for that year, was 2,445 pounds and nine shillings.

LONDON HIBERNIAN SOCIETY. In 1806, the "London Hibernian Society" was instituted. This is an invaluable institution, the design of which is the scriptural education of the poor in Ireland, by day, Sunday, and adult schools, and Scripture readers. The year ending May, 1831, presented returns of schools in thirty different counties in Ireland, in number 1,595; in which there were enrolled 85,755 scholars. The average attendance is about two-thirds of the whole, and about one half of them are Roman Catholics. "The only books supplied by the society are two spelling-books, and the Holy Scriptures of the authorized version, in English; and an Irish spelling-book, and the Holy Scriptures of bishop Bellini's and archbishop Daniel's version, in Irish. All the scholars, of sufficient age, read and commit to memory the Holy Scriptures. The scholars are inspected publicly once a quarter, and the teachers are paid only for those scholars who, on inspection, exhibit the required proficiency. The gross disbursements of last year were 3,435 pounds; the number of scholars may be taken at 70,000; this gives two shillings and five pence per head, without allowing anything for Scripture readers, salaries of agents, &c. If the Sunday scholars, adult scholars, Irish classes, &c., are left out of the account, and the whole sum supposed to be expended on 53,452 day scholars, it would give three shillings each scholar. The real average expense to the society of each scholar is, therefore, much less than three shillings per annum." This society is generously supplied with the Scriptures by grants from the Bible society. The report of 1831 states, "The committee are again called upon to acknowledge the renewed liberality of the British and Foreign Bible society, which, in addition to the munificent grant, announced at your last meeting, of 10,090 English Bibles, and 20,000 Testaments, has since cheerfully placed at our disposal 090 Irish Testaments."—Timpson.

LONDON ITINERANT SOCIETY. In 1826, the "London Itinerant Society" was formed. This was instituted to supply the means of religious instruction to the destitute villages within fifteen miles of the metropolis. Many Sunday schools have been established in neglected hamlets, and supplied with teachers and books by this society. Besides, the more gifted teachers have officiated as Scripture readers and preachers; and numerous congregations, at present enjoying settled pastors, originated in the agency of this more humble society. In 1830, seventeen preaching stations were reported, as regularly supplied by this institution, whose receipts were 429 pounds, and its expenditure, in rents of schools, &c., about the same amount.

LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY. In 1785, the "London Missionary Society" was formed. This was a noble expression of Christian benevolence, in which were united several liberal-minded clergymen and the principal ministers of the Independent denomination, with several of the Scotch secession, and of the Calvinistic Methodists. At their first annual meeting, in May, 1786, it was resolved, that "to prevent, if possible, any cause of future dissension, it is declared to be a fundamental principle of the Missionary society, that its design is not Presbyterianism, Independency, Episcopacy, or any other form of church order; but the glorious gospel of the blessed God to the heathen; leaving the converts to the Scriptures for church government." This society originated in a great measure with Dr. Edward Williams, an Independent minister of Birmingham, publishing an address to his brethren in the ministry, in the Evangelical Magazine, in 1794, established in that year. By this address, the servants of God were led to take measures for this institution. Dr. Williams, Dr. Haweis, Dr. Bogues, Mr. Eyre, Mr. Rowland Hill, Mr. Matthew Wilkes, were among its founders. The South Sea Islands were the station first chosen, and thirty missionaries were sent in the ship Duff. They were received by the natives of Tahiti with expressions of delight; but nearly twenty years they labored with but little success; when, at once, the divine blessing descended, and the whole population of several islands renounced idolatry, destroyed their idols, and embraced Christianity; multitudes of them in spirit and in truth. The work of God's grace continued to spread, and native teachers were raised up as missionaries to other and remote islands. To give a worthy account in this place is impossible; of the abolition of idolatry, infanticide, and other destructive abominations, as well as of the prevalence of religion among these once brutalized pagans. The African islands, but especially South Africa, has been marvellously blessed by means of the agents of this society; and the benefits of the British constitution have been extended to the enslaved Hottentots, and other nations of Africa, by the exertions of Dr. Philip. The East Indies have many successful laborers from this society; and an Anglo-Chinese college has been established by Dr. Morrison, Dr. Milne, and their colleagues, at Malacca, destined to be an inestimable blessing to the East. China has been blessed by the ministry of Dr. Morrison; who, with the assistance of Dr. Milne, has translated the whole of the Holy Scriptures into Chinese, and compiled a dictionary and grammar of that difficult language. This has been considered the noblest work of any uninspired writer, or of any agent in the church of God since the days of the apostles. This translation of the word of God opens the treasures of immortal life through Christ to nearly one-third of the population of the earth. Various other translations of the Scriptures have been made by the missionaries of this society, the particulars of which we cannot here detail.

"The society employs, besides, more than 400 schoolmasters, assistants, &c. Native churches, fifty-four; communicants, 4,557; schools, 448; scholars, 27,287; printing establishments, thirteen, from nine of which have been printed 250,000 books including 31,500 portions of Scripture; and from eleven stations 113,237 copies of books have been put in circulation during the past year."

"Receipts, nearly 37,500 pounds; expenditures, 41,600 pounds. An income of 45,000 pounds is necessary to sustain the society's operations, on their present scale, while calls for help from the South sea, India, Spanish America, &c. are numerous, loud, and urgent."—Id.

LONDON SEAMEN'S FRIEND SOCIETY. This society had its origin in the discovery of an interesting fact, in the year 1816. It was found at this time that the master of a collier, lying in the Thames, was accustomed to have morning and evening prayers on board his vessel, to which he invited the crews of other vessels lying in the neighborhood. At the same time many seamen were out of employ, having been discharged on the close of the then late war between the United States and Great Britain, and not a few of them were in circumstances of distress, which excited greatly the sympathy of the benevolent and humane. The inquiry arose, what could be done, and the meeting continuing on board the collier, in 1817, a man who had been so sent in early life, but was then a minister of the gospel, understanding the case, resolved on attending himself. He accordingly did attend; upon which, becoming much interested, as the worship was about to close, he introduced himself to the meeting, stating his former acquaintance with a seafaring life, and proposing to sustain, if it should be agreeable, a regular service among them. The proffer being gratefully accepted, the meeting was continued and enlarged. This led to notoriety, and thus to the formation, March 13, 1818, of the "London Seamen's Friend Society;" a principal object of which, on account of the growth of the meeting and the reluctance of the sailors to go to a common church, was to provide for them a Bethel ship, where they might feel at home and come with freedom. Having accomplished its primary object, as it soon did, the society found enough still to be done in benefit the seamen, and they have accordingly continued their operations to the spiritual and eternal joy of many souls. The example of the metropolis being known, it was soon followed in Greenock, Leith, Liverpool, Hull, Bristol, and other ports, in which similar societies were formed, and have since continued their benevolent operations.—Id.

LONDON SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION. In 1802, the "London Sunday School Union" was formed; the design of which is to stimulate Sunday school teachers to greater exertions; to improve the methods of tuition; to increase the number of Sunday schools; to furnish suitable books and stationery at the lowest prices; and to correspond with ministers and others, at home and abroad, for the purpose of promoting the establishment of Sunday schools, and local Sunday school unions. Both the foreign and home success of this society shows that it has richly received the divine blessing.

The annual meeting of this society for 1833 was held at Exeter hall. The report commenced with a sketch of the progress of the foreign Sunday schools in France, Denmark, Malta, New South Wales, South Africa, America, Canada, New Brunswick, the West Indies, and Jamaica. In France, the Sunday schools were stated to be extending among the Protestants. In Denmark two schools had been established near Copenhagen. In Antigua, there are in the Wesleyan Sunday schools 1832 scholars; and from Jamaica it is said that the Sunday schools at no period have afforded such cheering prospects of their still greater efficiency and universal establishment throughout the islands of the West Indies as at the present moment. The following summary of the returns of Sunday schools was given: from London auxiliaries, 522 schools, 6,973 teachers, and 74,878 scholars; Great Britain, 7,232 schools, 102,669 teachers, 360,410 scholars; the Sunday School society for Ireland, 2,542 schools, 19,142 teachers, 206,717 scholars; the London African Society's Sunday schools, 879 schools, and 16,430 scholars;—making a total 11,275 schools, 128,784 teachers, 1,153,354 scholars; and showing an increase on the last year of 329 schools, 12,486 teachers, and 22,915 scholars. The sales during the past year were stated, from the depository accounts, at 7,070 pounds, three shillings, and two pence.

METHODIST MISSIONS. In 1783, the "Methodist Missions" originated, when Mr. Wesley, at the conference held at Leeds, declared his intention of sending Dr. Coke, and some other preachers, to America, under the independence of that country had been acknowledged. Mr. Wesley says, in a letter, dated Bristol, September 10, 1784, "I have accordingly appointed Dr. Coke and Mr. Francis Asbury, to be my superintendants over the mission in North America; and also Richard Whatcoat, and Thomas Vasey, to act as elders among them, by baptizing and administering the Lord's supper." (See COKE.) In 1817, the "Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society" was organized; and since that period its operations have increased, in many places with most evident tokens of the divine benediction in the conversion of sinners to God. (See next article, and Missionary Gazetteer.)

METHODIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY. This society was instituted in 1819. Its object is to assist the several annual conferences to extend their missionary labors throughout the United States, and other countries. The society has missionaries among the Cherokee, Choctaw, Creek, Kansas, Green Bay, and Missouri Indians; embracing thirty missionaries, and fourteen schoolmasters. The society has sent one missionary, and have appointed two others to the same field. It has also fifty domestic missionaries; including four among the slaves in Georgia, and three among those in South Carolina.

The receipts of the society for the last year, 1832-3, were 16,375 dollars, and the expenditures 19,587 dollars.—Cogswell.

NAVAL AND MILITARY BIBLE SOCIETY. In 1780, the "Naval and Military Bible Society" was formed. In that year, a military camp was pitched in Hyde Park, on account of the riots in London; when "a very few plain Christians," affected with the profaneness of the soldiers, introduced the gospel among them by conversation and prayer, and suggested the propriety of an attempt to supply them with Bibles. The noble idea was cherished by a few pious officers, and the plan was framed to furnish the whole army and navy with the blessed word of God. This society has progressively advanced from "the day of small things," and has greatly increased. For several years it has included in its benevolent regards the seamen of the merchant service, with "all descriptions of watermen," and the naval and military servants of the East India company. From its commencement to the year 1830, there have been issued 244,477 copies of the Holy Scriptures, by the Naval and Military Bible society.—Timpson.

NORTHERN BAPTIST EDUCATION SOCIETY. It was not a contempt of education which prevented the early Baptists from providing generally the means of literary and theological instruction. One of the first efforts made by the denomination, when freed from persecution in England by the revolution of 1688, was to provide education for the ministry. A resolution was passed to that effect, at their first general meeting, in 1689, the same year in which they published their Confession of Faith. This resolution was the foundation of the celebrated Bristol academy.

The denomination both in England and in this country have always regarded parental piety and manifest evidence of a divine call to the work, as of the highest concern, as previously and always, and absolutely indispensable. These are their settled principles still. But they have ever prized learning and cultivation of mind, in connexion with the former. Hence the liberal endowments of Harvard university by Hollis, in 1722. Hence the establishment of the Hopewell academy, in 1756, and of Brown university, in 1766, in both which the leading object was the education of the ministry. Various others followed. And the Philadelphia Warren and Charleston associations at an early period raised a considerable amount of funds for this object, and were in fact, if not in name, education societies.

The Northern Baptist Education society, under the name of the Massachusetts Education society, was formed in 1814. Its name was altered in 1829. The report for 1833 states that the whole number of young men assisted by the parent society, during the past year, is 124; received, during the same period, thirty-nine; dismissed, twenty-one; leaving the present number 102. They are found in the following institutions: Newton theological institution; Hamilton literary and theological institution; Brown university; Waterville college; Middlebury college; Grayville literary and theological institution; New Hampton institution; and also in the following academies and high schools: South Reading, Waterville, Middleborough, Providence, Pawtucket, Sufield, Portland, Amherst, Framingham, Hinsburg, and Bennington. The parent society and the respective branches have received, during the past year, $499 dollars, and ninety nine cents, which exceeds the entire receipts of the preceding year by 2,198 dollars and fifty-four cents.

The whole number received from the commencement of the society, in 1814, up to 1830, embracing a period of fourteen years, was 128; the number received from that time to the present period, embracing a term of three years, is 114. The whole amount expended during fifteen years, was 26,679 dollars, and eighty-eight cents. The amount expended during the three last passed, is 17,095 dollars, and forty-six cents. If to this estimate we should add the results of the branch societies, the product of the three last years would be more than equal to all which the society had accomplished since 1830.

Besides this, there is the New York Baptist Education society, formed in 1817, which founded the Hamilton seminary, now the largest Protestant theological institution in the United States, having eight professors, and 180 students. Also the Central Baptist Education society, whose seat is at Philadelphia; the Southern Baptist Education society, embracing the southern states; and the Western Baptist Education society, embracing the western states, whose seat of operation is Cincinnati.—Allen's Bap. Register.

PEACE SOCIETY. This class of benevolent associations have for their object the suppression of war; and the promotion of amicable views and friendly conduct among all mankind.

The circumstances and occurrences which have led to their origin and history, so far as known, are as follows. A proposition in London for a peace society, and the formation of a peace society, first in New York, next in Warren county, Ohio, and last in Boston, Massachusetts, were nearly simultaneous. The proposition in London, though not exactly for a peace society, yet virtually amounting to that, was made in the Philanthropist for July, 1815; the society in Ohio, December 2, 1815, and the Massachusetts Peace society, December 28, 1815.

The London Peace society, or "the Society for promoting Permanent and Universal Peace," was formed in London, July 14, 1816, and the Hibernian Peace society, November 11, 1824. The first peace society on the continent was formed in Geneva, in Switzerland, December, 1830. The American Peace society was formed at New York, May, 1828.

The amount of good accomplished by these societies has been considerable, especially in the way of circulating tracts and awakening the attention to the subject of peace. Most of the societies have numerous auxiliaries, by which information concerning the object of the society is diffused through the community. Besides occasional pamphlets which they have published, the societies in this country have now for a number of years constantly kept open a communication through some periodical; they have also employed agents at different times; and now the American Peace society has a permanent general agent and secretary, whose entire services are devoted to the interests of the society. Its periodical is the Advocate of Peace, published quarterly at Hartford, Conn. The president is S. V. S. Wilder, Esq., and the corresponding secretary and general agent, William Ladd, Esq.—Cogswell's Harbinger of the Millennium.

PORT OF LONDON SOCIETY. In 1818, the "Port of London Society" was formed; and with it was united, in 1827, the "Bethel Union." The design of these societies was for "promoting religion among British and foreign seamen." This society appears, from its report for the year ending April, 1831, to employ one missionary and four ministers, as its principal agents. It has a floating chapel on the river Thames; in which ministers of different denominations preach gratuitously in connexion with the society's ministers. Bethel meetings for prayer are held on board those vessels in the river, whose captains are pious, or inclined to sanction the religious improvement of their men. One of the agents writes, "I frequently behold five, six, and even seven lanterns, the humble but significant symbols for divine worship;" and at these meetings, chiefly in the vessels of colliers, he says, "four, five, six, and more of the sailors engage in prayer." Small libraries are furnished to many ships; a day school for the children of watermen, an orphan asylum, in which fifty-three children are supported and educated, and the Sailor's Magazine, are connected with this society, which has been the means of originating other similar societies at our principal ports, and in America. The expenditure of this society, for the year, was 816 pounds, seventeen shillings, and eight pence.—Timpson.

PRAYER BOOK AND HOMILY SOCIETY. In 1812, the

"Prayer Book and Homily Society" was formed; "the sole object of which is the distribution of the authorized formularies of the church of England, both at home and abroad, in English and in foreign languages." The whole or parts of these formularies have been translated into several languages, and there is reason to believe that their circulation has been accompanied with the most successful results. The number of books distributed by the society, from the first, is of prayer books, 177,215; of its tracts, 1,450,555. The expenditure of the year 1830 was 2,285 pounds, eight shillings, and nine pence.—Timpson.

PRISON DISCIPLINE SOCIETY. The leader in this department of benevolence must ever be acknowledged to be the excellent John Howard, of Cardington, England, who, for a number of the last years of his life, devoted himself and his fortune to the investigation of the condition of prisoners. From the time of his death in 1790, the cause seems to have declined, and comparatively little was attempted in Europe or America, till about ten or twelve years ago. Of foreign societies not much information has been obtained. The London society has been in operation about eleven years. In 1827, the receipts were about 8,000, and the expenditures about 12,000 dollars.

In Ireland an association is formed at Dublin for the improvement of prisoners; and prison discipline societies of this nature also exist in France, at Ponceburg, in Russia, the Netherlands, and in the Prussian dominions. In Germany the subject is exciting the attention of the public. Dr. Julius, of Hamburg, is much engaged in this cause.

The Prison Discipline society of this country owes its origin, principally, to the Christian enterprise and persevering efforts of the Rev. Lewis Dwight, who, in 1821-2, commenced the investigation of the condition of the prisons and penitentiaries of the United States, and pursued it in succeeding years, till June 30, 1825, when the Prison Discipline society was formed at Boston. The object of the society is "the improvement of public prisons."

Besides the object already mentioned, in relation to which the society has produced a desirable change, there is also the subject of imprisonment for debt, and the criminal code of laws generally, towards which the directors successfully attract the attention of legislators, judges, and jurors. The annual reports of the society embody also a vast amount of facts, in relation to the causes, circumstances, and means of prevention of crimes and offences in the community, which cannot be found elsewhere.—Cogswell's Harbinger of the Millennium.

PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL IN FOREIGN PARTS. SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL IN FOREIGN PARTS.

PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH, DOMESTIC AND FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY OF. This society is "composed of the bishops of the Protestant Episcopal church, and of such other persons as shall contribute, by subscription, three dollars or more, annually, to the objects of the institution, during the continuance of such contributions; and of such as shall contribute at once thirty dollars, which contribution shall constitute them members for life. Clergymen who pay fifty dollars, and other persons who pay 100 dollars, at one time, are denominated patrons." The society meets triennially, at the place at which the general convention of the Protestant Episcopal church in the United States holds its session. The presiding bishop of the church is president of the society; and the other bishops, according to seniority, vice-presidents. The other officers are, a secretary, a treasurer, and twenty-four directors, chosen by ballot at each meeting. The triennial meeting of the society was held in New York, on the 18th, 19th, 20th, 21st, 22d, 26th, 27th, and 29th of October last.—Goodrich.

SABBATH, GENERAL UNION FOR THE OBSERVANCE OF THE (See GENERAL UNION FOR THE OBSERVANCE OF THE SABBATH.)

SCOTTISH BISHOPRIAN SOCIETY. In 1795, the "Scottish Missionary Society" was formed; and though its labors had not been so extensive as those of some others, it has sent forth many valuable missionaries. It has eleven missionaries: one at Karass, in Russian Tartary, one at Astrachan, five in the East Indies, and four in the West Indies. The expenditure of this society for the year ending March, 1831, was seven thousand four hundred and eighty-seven pounds, four shillings, and six pence.

SEAMEN'S FRIEND SOCIETY. (AMERICAN.) The oldest of this class of societies, so far as information has been obtained, is that of Boston. It appears to have been formed anew and to have adopted its present constitution in January, 1823, but its first organization was in 1812. The early objects of this society were first to distribute tracts among seamen, and secondly to establish for them a regular worship. Of these, the latter was not accomplished till 1818, when regular worship for seamen was first commenced in the room under the observatory on Central wharf, by the Rev. William Jenks, D. D.

Through the labors of the Rev. Mr. Eastburn, who distinguished himself as the friend of seamen in Philadelphia, the efforts in their behalf in that city are peculiarly interesting. It is believed, too, they were anterior to those in New York, but the documents are not at hand from which to state the facts.

The Society for Promoting the Gospel among Seamen at New York, was instituted in January, 1818, and incorporated in April, soon after its organization. It owes its origin principally to the Rev. Ward Starbuck, through whose influence, in part, as means of working for seamen in New York, was provided. This was dedicated June 1, 1820. The society publishes a monthly periodical, entitled the Sailor's Magazine. The income of the society in 1832 was 5,679 dollars. Besides these societies, which are some of the most considerable, there are seamen's friend societies in almost all the principal ports in the country, from New Orleans to Portland. Something has been commenced, too, in behalf of the numerous boatmen employed on canals and rivers. The amount of expenditures in this department of benevolence cannot be accurately stated. It is small, however, compared with what it ought to be.

Besides being remembered in Christian countries, seamen are beginning to be remembered where Christianity is not known or has but recently been introduced. Missionaries have generally been interested for them, and two devoted especially to their cause, have been sent by the American Society for the Propagation of the Gospel to the East Indies; the other, Rev. Mr. Dhill, to the Sandwich Islands. Another is to be sent to France.—Cogswell's Harbinger of the Millennium.

SERAMPORE MISSIONS. In 1827, the brethren at Serampore withdrew from their friends in England. Some misunderstanding had existed between them, in reference to the terms on which the premises at Serampore were held, the college which the brethren there had erected, chiefly for literary objects, and the support required for the outstations connected with Serampore. A protracted correspondence took place at different times. In March, 1827, a final and amicable separation took place. The Serampore brethren have now thirteen outstations, Serampore, Puri-Dum, Barr-pore, Jessore, Burisal, Dacca, Assam, Chittagong, Arracan, Dinagore, Banars, Allahabad, and Delhi, with seven subordinate stations. There are seventeen European and Indo-British missionaries, and fifteen native preachers; forty-six persons were received into communion in 1829. The annual expense of the missions is about fifteen thousand rupees. The college at Serampore is in a flourishing state. Translations of the Scriptures into some of the more important languages of the East have been made by the Serampore missionaries.—Timpson.

SEVENTH COMMANDMENT, AMERICAN SOCIETY TO PROMOTE THE OBSERVANCE OF THE. A society under this title was organized in the city of New York in 1833, embracing many of the most respectable citizens of our country. Its design is to aid in purifying the land from the evils of licentiousness.

SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING CHRISTIAN KNOWLEDGE. In 1698, "the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge" originated. It was formed, as bishop Burnet observed, after the example of the Dissenters, whose missionary labors and success in America had been noticed by some pious clergymen with devout admiration. The design of this society was, at first, the circulation of the Bible and other religious books in the colonies; but seeing that their efforts were productive of fruit in America and the West Indies, they were induced to send out several missionaries, and took measures to render their society permanent in its operations. In 1700, it was divided into two branches: one retaining its original title, to provide and furnish Bibles and religious books; the other undertook to provide for the religious instruction of the British colonies. (See next article.) Until the establishment of the British and Foreign Bible society, this institution was comparatively lifeless and inactive; but since that event, its efforts have been so wonderfully increased, that the report for 1828 states, that during the year it had issued 58,582 Bibles, 80,216 Testaments and Psalters, 153,421 Common Prayers, 106,552 other bound books, and 1,257,315 small tracts, half-bound books and papers. Its receipts, including sales of books, legacies, subscriptions, &c., had been 65,540 pounds. There has been some increase in the society during the last two years, but the above is our latest report.

This is peculiarly the church of England society; and the great body of its supporters object to the British and Foreign Bible society, as unnecessary, declaring their conviction that this alone is sufficient. But it will be seen that this society issues the Bible in no more than two foreign languages, besides the English; whereas the British and Foreign Bible society circulates the word of God in more than 150 languages.—Timpson.

SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL IN FOREIGN PARTS. As the "Abstract of the Charter" states, "king William III. was graciously pleased, on the 16th of June, 1701, to erect and settle a corporation, with a perpetual succession, by the name of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, and under their instruction." This society is regarded by the evangelical clergy as not conducted on evangelical principles.—ib.

SUNDAY SCHOOL SOCIETY. (LONDON.) In 1785, the Sunday School society was formed, chiefly by the instrumentality of William Fox, Esq., a deacon of a Baptist church in London.

In 1784, Mr. Robert Raikes, a worthy and liberal churchman, at Gloucester, deeply affected with the prevailing ignorance and depravity of the lower classes around him, commenced a Sunday school, for the purpose of teaching the children of the poor to read the Holy Scriptures. At the same time, Mr. William Fox, a Baptist of London, was deliberating on a plan for the universal education of the poor; and this denomination, which Fox intended to limit his plan to the Baptist, and therefore we must call upon all the world to help us, a provisional committee was appointed, to appeal to the public, and to call a public meeting, for the purpose of forming a society for the education of the poor." Mr. Fox, in the mean time, hearing of Mr. Raikes' attempts, opened a correspondence with him, to learn his plan of procedure; through which, at the public meeting, August 10, 1785, there was formed "a Society for the Establishment and Support of Sunday Schools throughout Great Britain." This proceeding being published and the plan was immediately adopted by several bodies of dissenters and Methodists; so that in a few years almost every congregation had a Sunday school attached to it; and thus so many nurseries were established for the increase of Christian knowledge, and the enlargement of the church of God.

This society has continued in operation to the present time; and has been the means of establishing and of assisting in the support of many Sunday schools throughout Great Britain and our colonies. The number of schools assisted with grants of books, during the year 1830, is 1,200; containing 52,434 scholars; of which number, 117 schools received grants in preceding years. From the commencement of the institution to the present year, the grand total of books gratuitously voted to Sunday schools, is stated at 15,218 Bibles; 145,920 Testaments; and 895,331 elementary books and lessons. The expenditure on this score, during the past year, is 921 pounds, fifteen shillings, and three pence.—Timpson.

SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION, (AMERICAN.) was formed at Philadelphia, out of the Philadelphia Sunday and Adult School Union, at its seventh anniversary, in May, 1824. Its officers are a president, a large number of vice-presidents, a corresponding and a recording secretary, a board of managers, and several committees, which with the committee on books is the most important. It is understood that it consists to be composed of men of different religious denominations, and that no book is to appear, as a book of the society, without having first received the approbation of each and every member of the same. The auxiliaries in 1833, of this society, were 790. Schools connected with the union, 9187. Scholars, 542,420. Teachers, 80,913. Teachers and scholars reported to have become pious during the eight years of the society's existence, 26,393; and during the year ending March 1, 1832, 6,444. Expenditures for the same time, $117,703 64, and receipts, including the balance on hand at the commencement of the year, $113,181 10. The society has made special exertions in behalf of the valley of the Mississippi, and the destitute parts of the country generally. The resolution which was adopted at the anniversary of the society in 1830,—“That the American Sunday School Union, in reliance upon the divine aid, will, within two years, establish a Sunday school in every destitute place where it is practicable, throughout the valley of the Mississippi,” has, to a very considerable extent, been carried into effect.—Cogswell's Harbinger of the Millennium.

SUNDAY SCHOOL SOCIETY FOR IRELAND. This society was formed in 1819. According to the twenty-first report of this society, its receipts for the year were 3,330 pounds, three shillings and three pence; 2,771 pounds, eleven shillings, and eight pence, by subscriptions and donations. The number of schools connected with the society January 1, 1831, was 251. Gratuitous teachers, 15,657; scholars, 203,330.

The society had also distributed, in all, from the time of its formation, 233,616 Testaments. A considerable number of associations, in aid of the society, have been formed in England, Wales and Scotland.—Timpson.

TEMPERANCE SOCIETY, (AMERICAN.) The primary origin of temperance societies is wholly American. The first considerable movement on the subject was in 1811. A committee was then appointed by the General Association of Massachusetts, to co-operate with committees of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian church, and the General Association of Connecticut, in devising plans, by which the most pernicious and the most threatening evils provided against. This resulted in the formation, February 15, 1813, of the Massachusetts Society for the Suppression of Intemperance. This society was not formed on what has proved the successful principle, but that principle was about this time suggested in a course of articles published in the Panoplist, and written by the Rev. H. Humphrey. To suppress intemperance, while continuing the moderate use, as it has been called, of ardent spirit, proving impracticable, total abstinence was at length more particularly advocated in 1822. Sufficient time had elapsed for the Massachusetts Society for the Suppression of Intemperance to make trial of its success, and prove its insufficiency. In the mean time, articles had been published on the general subject, and the public mind was becoming more and more prepared for the movements which have since followed. Dr. Rush had written on the use of ardent spirit, as early as 1804, showing its evil effects; and besides the essays of Mr. Humphrey, in 1813, a tract was published in 1811, against the use of it in entertainment; and Judge Nuttall published his Exposé in 1819. The doctrine was at length insisted on, that ardent spirit is not necessary. In 1823, Dr. Edwards wrote the tract entitled “The well-conducted Firm,” exhibiting the result of an experiment in carrying on a life without the use of ardent spirits. About the same time, the Massachusetts Society for the Suppression of Intemperance began to revive, and took the ground of total abstinence; and though as yet there was no general movement, many were becoming prepared for action. At length, arrangements were made for a general meeting of men of various religious denominations, at Boston, January 10, 1826, and at an adjourned meeting, February 13, 1826, the American Temperance Society was formed.

In 1827 an effort was made to establish a fund for the support of a corresponding secretary, and general permanent agent of the society, and considerable sums were obtained in Boston, Salem, Newburyport, Andover, and Northampton. This year, the Rev. J. Edwards, who had acted as secretary and agent, not being permitted, on account of his pastoral duties, to continue his labors for the society, the Rev. N. Hewitt was appointed in his place. In this year, also, several of the most popular and affecting temperance addresses and sermons were published. Medical societies also came forward this year, in resolutions, seconding the cause, and declaring the uselessness and injurious tendency of ardent spirit. Tracts too were multiplied, and all sober men seemed to be of one mind on the subject.

In 1831, Dr. Hewitt visited Europe, and arrived in London just in time to attend the meeting for the formation of a temperance society for the United Kingdom, which, at his suggestion, was styled “The British and Foreign Temperance Society.” There had been some movement on the subject of temperance before, especially in Ireland, where the first temperance society in Europe was formed. In 1824, important temperance meetings were held in England, at Worcester, York, Islington, and other places, and the consumption of ardent spirit was supposed to be diminished one-third. Something was beginning to be done, too, in other countries abroad. The emperor of China forbade spirit to be sold to nominal Christians, and temperance societies were formed at different places on the coast of Africa. In the Sandwich islands especially the influence was very prosperous.

In November, 1832, an order from the war department of government suspended the rations of spirit to the soldiers, and reformation is taking place in the army generally. Additions to the temperance societies were made as in years previous, and the number of societies in all, taking the whole country together, was more than 10,000, embracing more than 1,500,000 members. The number of distilleries stopped was more than 1500, and more than 4000 merchants had given over the traffic. In accomplishing all this, adequate means were of course necessary, and besides agents and occasional correspondence, there were issued in the state of New York alone, not less than 327,725 copies of different temperance publications. Since the opening of 1833, a Congressional Temperance Society has been formed at Washington, embracing a large number of the principal men in both houses of congress.

In March, 1826, the first temperance paper in the world was published, by the Rev. William Collier, of Boston, under the name of the National Philanthropist. Its motto was, “Moderate drinking is the downhill road to intemperance and drunkenness.” This proved an important auxiliary to the temperance reform. The Genius of Temperance followed in 1828; the Journal of Humanity in 1829. Publications in favor of temperance continue to multiply, among which may be mentioned “The American Quarterly Temperance Magazine,” at Albany, New York.—Cogswell's Harbinger of the Millennium.

TEMPERANCE SOCIETY, BRITISH AND FOREIGN. (See the foregoing article.)

TRACT SOCIETY, AMERICAN. The American Tract Society, at Boston, was formed in 1814. The receipts of the society, for the year ending May, 1832, were 12,606 dollars and forty-nine cents, and its expenditures, 12,237 dollars and eighty-four cents. The number of pages distributed was 14,500,710. Auxiliaries, 703, of which 140 are in Maine, 164 in New Hampshire, 196 in Vermont, and 254 in Massachusetts. Of the whole number, however, 117 only made donations during the year, and the receipts of the society arose principally from the sale of tracts.

In 1825, another society was instituted at New York, called the “American Tract Society.” The object of it is, to “diffuse a knowledge of the Lord Jesus Christ as the Redeemer of sinners, and to promote the interests of vital godliness and sound morality, by the circulation of religious tracts, calculated to receive the approbation of all evangelical Christians.” To this latter society, the Boston Tract society has become auxiliary, although it still retains the name it received from the legislature of the state in which it is located.

During the past year, the society at New York has stereotyped thirty-five new publications, making the whole number of the society's publications 618. The following is a

Receipts and Expenditures.—The total receipts of the society, during the year, from all sources, including 31,117 dollars, and fifty-eight cents, for tracts sold, and 6,856 dollars, and ninety-seven cents, for to aid in foreign distribution, were 62,443 dollars, and fifty cents; and the total of expenditures, including 26,032 dollars, and eighty-nine cents, for paper and printing, and 10,000 dollars for foreign distribution, and 9,847 dollars, and ninety cents, for other gratuitous appropriations, and for foreign agencies, were 62,443 dollars, and fifty cents.

Branches and Auxiliaries.—New ones, 115; making the whole number 993; which, together with those connected with the several branches, makes the whole number 4,595.

Foreign Fields.—The society has appropriated 10,000 dollars, during the year, to promote the circulation of tracts in Burmah, China, Bombay, Ceylon, Swadwich islands, Greece, and other countries of the Mediterranean, France, Germany, and Russia.

Besides the above, there are in the country other efficient societies of a similar character, viz.: the Connecticut Religious Tract society, instituted at New Haven, 1807; the Vermont Religious Tract society, formed 1808; the Protestant Episcopal Tract society at New York, established in 1810; and the Baptist General Tract society at Philadelphia, formed in 1824. This last has 150 auxiliaries and a number of branches. (See GENERAL TRACT SOCIETY.) There is, also, the American Doctrinal Tract society, formed May, 1829.

TRACT SOCIETY, (LONDON REGIONALS.) In 1790, the "Religious Tract Society" was instituted. Previously, some worthy efforts had been made by Mrs. Hannah More and a few friends, and their Cheap Repository Tracts had been brought into extensive circulation. The Rev. George Burder and the Rev. Samuel Greathead had also published their "Village Tracts," by which the saving doctrines of the gospel had been happily communicated to many. But in May 17, 1799, the Rev. Joseph Hughes, A. M., a Baptist minister of London, and four lay gentlemen, were appointed at a public meeting to carry into effect the object of the friends present. The Religious Tract Society, thus formed, includes members of the church of England, as well as Dissenters, and its Fundamental principle, to which it has labored sacredly to adhere, is contained in their first tract, written by Dr. Bogue, an Independent minister, in which they profess that their publications should "consist of pure truth." "This, flowing from the sacred fountain of the New Testament, should run from beginning to end; uncontaminated with error, undisturbed by human systems; clear as crystal, like the water of life." "By way of explanation," the committee add, "that by pure truth, when not expressed in the words of Scripture, they refer to those evangelical principles of the Reformation, in which Luther, Calvin, and Cranmer agreed. On this large portion of ground, which the churchman, the Dissenter, and the foreigner jointly occupy, they conceive that Christian union may be established and strengthened; Christian affection excited and cherished; Christian zeal concentrated and rendered proportionally effective. Every year the operations of this society have increased: but to do justice to its principles, proceedings, and publications, is impossible. Talents of the highest order have been engaged in preparing its varied works, which are adapted for all ages, from the lisping infant to the mature believer and the dying saint, illustrative of the gospel, and demonstrative of its divinity. Their numerous publications for the young, their antiques to its fidelity, the series of Christian Biography, Church History, Works of the Reformers, Commentary on the Bible, and Monthly Magazines, are above all praise. And as many of its publications have been translated into various languages of the East, as well as of Europe, and widely circulated, eternity alone can develop the abundance and richness of its fruits. The missionaries of the various societies receive the most valuable and seasonable help from this great institution. The receipts of the Tract Society for the year ending May, 1830, were 25,062 pounds, sixteen shillings, and four pence; and the number of publications issued, more than 10,000,000. The total circulation of the society, at home and abroad, since its commencement, exceeds 140,000,000 of its publications!"

The receipts of 1832 were 31,376 pounds, but those of the present year were 40,000 pounds, being an increase of 8,624 pounds.—Times,

UNION, AMERICAN, FOR THE RELIEF AND IMPROVEMENT OF THE COLORED RACE. A society under this designation has just been formed in the city of Boston. According to the second article of the constitution, the object of the society is, "to promote, in all suitable ways, the intellectual and moral elevation of the colored race; and by disseminating information, and exerting a kind moral influence, to convince all American citizens, that the system of slavery in this country is wrong, and ought to be universally abandoned." UNITED BRETHREN'S MISSIONS. (See MORAVIAN MISSIONS.)

VILLAGE ITINERANCY. In 1796 was formed the "Village Itinerancy, or Evangelical Association for Spreading the Gospel in England." This society originated with the late Rev. John Eyre, M. A., a clergyman of the church of England, but a man of enlarged benevolence of heart, uniting with Dissenters in extending the work of God for the salvation of men. Some villages destitute of the gospel, in Hants, Sussex, and Surrey, were the scenes of their first operations. In 1801, the late C. Townsend, Esq., joined this infant society, and in 1802 they conferred with the Rev. George Collison respecting a theological seminar for the preparation of pious young men for the ministry. Mr. Townsend died February, 1803, leaving ten thousand pounds for the purposes of the institution to Mr. Eyre as treasurer, who died the next month; but the money being obtained, the college was commenced at Hackney, in October, 1803, under the direction of Mr. Collier, as tutor. More than one hundred young men of credible piety have been educated at this academy, some of whom are highly esteemed ministers in the metropolis, and in different parts of the kingdom; others have gone as missionaries to the heathen; and some have been ordained to the ministry in the church of England. By occasional or annual grants from this society, many worthy pastors have been assisted; and many villages in Great Britain have been blessed by its operations. Together with the interest of some funded property, this excellent institution is supported by voluntary contributions; and in the year ending March, 1830, the expenditure was two thousand three hundred and forty-six pounds, eleven shillings, and six pence.—Times.

RELIGIOUS DENOMINATIONS IN THE UNITED STATES, 1834-5.

ORTHODOX CONGREGATIONALISTS.—Maine, 180 churches, 110 pastors or supplies, 30 unsettled ministers, 13,019 communicants. New Hampshire, 152 churches, 102 pastors, 12 unsettled ministers, 14,000 communicants. Vermont, 206 churches, 172 ministers, 23,000 communicants. Massachusetts, 342 churches, 320 ministers, 50,000 communicants. Rhode Island, 10 churches, 10 ministers, 1400 communicants. Connecticut, 240 churches, 250 ministers, 31,000 communicants. Other States, 90 churches, 80 ministers, 10,000 communicants. Total, 1300 churches, 1150 ministers, 160,000 communicants.

UNITARIAN CONGREGATIONALISTS.—170 societies, 150 ministers, 170,000 population.

PRESBYTERIANS.—23 synods, 118 presbyteries, 2,643 congregations, 1,914 pastors, 236 unsettled ministers, 247,964 communicants.

REFORMED DUTCH CHURCH.—200 churches, 180 ministers, 23,000 communicants, about 31,000 families, and 160,000 souls.

EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH.—9 synods, 630 congregations, 192 ministers, 59,852 communicants.

GERMAN REFORMED CHURCH.—3 synods, 570 churches or congregations, 160 ministers.

CALVINISTIC BAPTISTS.—5,513 churches, 3,810 ministers, 409,653 communicants.

PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH.—19 dioceses, 18 bishops, 650 clergyman, between 700 and 800 parishes.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.—5 bishops, 22 conferences, 2,600 travelling preachers, 631,660 members, of whom 80,044 are colored.

ASSOCIATE PRESBYTERIANS.—10 presbyteries, 79 ministers, 169 congregations, 5,129 families, 12,856 communicants.

VARIOUS SECTS OF BAPTISTS.—726 churches, 616 ministers, 39,000 communicants.

ASSOCIATE AND OTHER METHODISTS.—400 ministers, 50,000 communicants.

OTHER SECTS.—United Brethren, 24 congregations, 33 ministers, 5,745 members, including children. Cumberland Presbyterians, 70 ministers, 110 congregations, 15,000 communicants. Friends, 450 congregations, and 220,000 population. Unitarians, 3 or 400 ministers, 5 or 600 congregations. Roman Catholics, 1 archbishop, 10 bishops, 227 officiating clergymen, 146 sisters of charity, 3 Roman Catholic colleges, 29 convents, &c., 550,000 population. New Jerusalem Church, 31 ministers, 25 societies, 122 places where there are known to be receivers of the doctrines. Jews, 15,000 population. Shakers, 45 ministers, 15 churches or congregations. Several smaller sects, and persons of no denomination, would probably amount to 800,000 or 1,000,000 in population.

NOTICES AND RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE ENCYCLOPÆDIA OF RELIGIOUS KNOWLEDGE.

'The Encyclopædia of Religious Knowledge is, upon the whole, a valuable book of reference, and the theological articles are, in the main, good. The work is rich in biographical notices, and contains much useful information respecting the tenets of different sects, which in most cases is supplied by their own writers. The theological student will find it a convenient and useful companion.
A. ALEXANDER, D. D.
Princeton Theol. Sem., N. J.'

'I regard the Ency. of Rel. Knowledge as a very valuable book of reference. While it is particularly convenient and useful to ministers of the gospel, it will be found to be very entertaining and instructive to others, and is well worthy of a place in every family library.
B. TYLER, D. D.
Pres. of E. Windsor Theol. Institute, Conn.'

'I have examined the Ency. of Rel. Knowledge in sundry of its articles; and holding in my library its principal authorities, I am ready to say that I much approve it. We have no work which contains, and judiciously contains, so much informing matter at so moderate a price.
Rev. JONATHAN HOMER, D. D.
Newton, Mass.'

'This volume is certainly an exception to the general style in which compends, summaries, and Encys. are manufactured among us. It bears the marks of care, honest research, and accurate statement. The commendable practice is followed of giving the authorities at the close of each article.

It is not a bookkeeping expedient, prepared in the haste of a plagiarist from English works; but in part original, and in part condensed, and accommodated to suit the general intention of the volume. The department of religious biography is very complete;—a field of labor in which the American Encyclopædia is notoriously deficient. Candor and good judgment are here manifested.

On the whole, we heartily commend this publication to our readers. It will repay me ten fold the cost of its purchase. No single volume in the language, so far as we know, contains a larger amount of valuable knowledge.'
[Biblical Repository and Quarterly Observer.]

'We are so confident that this must be a valuable acquisition to any man's library; and one who expects to purchase and use much literature of this sort, we are equally confident, will save both money and time by subscribing for this.

We have Encys. in other departments of science; but we do not know that any thing in the form of a Religious Ency. has ever been published in this, or any other country. A work of this kind has therefore been a great desideratum in the religious and reading community.

So far as we have examined it—and we have devoted some time and care to the subject—the book fulfils the large promise of the title quite as well as could reasonably be expected. It is a vast storehouse of information all the subjects indicated, judiciously selected—condensed, perspicuous, and well arranged; and, what is of great importance, with references, at the end of the more important articles, to works from which more particular information may be obtained. The work is handsomely printed, on good paper; the type is clean and fair, and sufficiently large. On the whole, it is entirely beyond any thing else extant as a convenient book of reference for clergymen, teachers of Bible classes and Sabbath schools, and all, in fact, who wish for any book of reference of the kind to assist them in their biblical and religious reading. It is marvelously cheap. We recommend it confidently. It will not disappoint any reasonable expectations.'
[Et. Chronicle.]

'A very useful work, 1300 imp. 8vo pages. Its usefulness in the family, in reading religious intelligence and other publications, and in writing on religious subjects, is obvious. The price, for so large a volume, prepared with so much labor, must be acknowledged very reasonable—cheap.'
[N. Y. Evangelist.]

'The editorial execution altogether surpasses my expectations, and I am persuaded the work will be extensively popular.
Rev. GEO. RUSI,
Prof. of Ori. Lit. in N. Y. City University.'

'Its plan is very comprehensive, and embraces a variety of information respecting the state of religion throughout the world, which cannot be obtained except by recourse to a great number of original sources.

In regard to the different denominations in our own country, it is necessary only to recur to the names of the gentlemen who furnish the accounts of them, to obtain full confidence in the fidelity with which those accounts may be expected to be composed.'
[Boston Christian Register.]

'This work contains in itself a religious library; and as such we consider it one of great value to the Christian public.

The plan of it is happily adapted to make it a book of reference, a convenient substitute, and more than a substitute for many volumes which Christian readers have heretofore had occasion to consult. And from an examination of a large number of articles, the plan appears to have been well executed. Many of the original articles are ably written. Those condensed from other works were evidently prepared with great care and attention, and show the result of extensive reading and patient research. Its cheapness strongly commends it to public favor.'
[Southern Rel. Telegraph, Richmond, Va.]

'The Encyclopædia of Religious Knowledge is deservedly having a large sale.'
[Boston Recorder.]

'Though it is a large volume, yet in view of its variety and comprehensiveness, it is multum in parvo,—much in a small space,—an ocean of matter in a drop of words. The work has been compiled with immense labor, with great accuracy and uncommon impartiality. Mr. Brown has performed his difficult and delicate task in a judicious manner—in a manner to highly promote the public benefit, and to entitle him to the approbation and gratitude of the community. We are happy to add, that the work has been got up in a handsome style, and in good taste.

We should sincerely hope, that the cause of truth and the interest of the religious public may be promoted by its extensive circulation. It should be a companion to the Bible in every family; it should find a place in the library of every Sunday school teacher; and we venture little in saying that, as a work of reference, the ministers of the gospel would find it convenient and useful.'
[American Baptist (New York).]

'The object of the work is to condense into one volume the most important matter now scattered throughout many expensive publications. The compiler appears to have executed his task with commendable diligence and good judgment. It requires more than ordinary industry, in compiling such a work, to determine what to reject and what to retain. As far as we have been able to examine the work, we think the author deserves the credit of a faithful and judicious compiler.—We deem the work worthy of extensive patronage. It is well executed, on good paper, and illustrated with engravings and wood cuts; and we hope the enterprising publishers will be well repaid for their expenditure on this praiseworthy and expensive work.'
[Richmond Rel. Herald.]

'The general execution of the work is decidedly good. We recommend it for its general excellence, as a most useful book of reference, to families which desire information on religious subjects.'
[Presbyterian (Philadelphia).]

'This work is emphatically what its title imports, a repository of every description of religious knowledge, alphabetically arranged, for easy and familiar reference. It seems to embrace just that kind of knowledge which the ministers of the gospel, and the curious and enlightened Christian of every denomination, requires, relative to the Bible, theology, religious biography, ecclesiastical history, missions and all religions. The amount of matter embraced in about 1300 large octavo pages on these subjects is incalculable—enough, we should think, to fill 15 or 20 volumes of the Family Library. We consider it, in fact, if not the only, the most recent, comprehensive, illustrative, and trustworthy work of reference on all denominational points, and topics adverted to above, extant. It is designed as a complete book of reference on all religious subjects, and companion to the Bible, forming a compact library of religious knowledge; and when the excellent motto, where it will, we would not, find a place in almost every Christian family.
[N. Y. Weekly Messenger.]

'We have recently procured a copy of this excellent work—it is just such a work as the religious public have long needed. It fills a place that is not occupied by any other work in the English language. We wish one could be placed in the hands of every minister of the gospel throughout our country. This one volume would be to him a valuable library of religious knowledge; he might accumulate a great variety of books before he could otherwise obtain the information which he needs upon various points, and which would be directly available in the great work in which he is engaged. Here he has a condensed, but accurate and satisfactory view of the religious customs and sentiments of the different denominations of Christians; and, notwithstanding their number and diversity, he can in this volume hear them nearly all speak their own language and assign their own reasons. But besides information with regard to different religions, and the different denominations of the Christian religion, the minister of Christ may here find a distinct and evangelical statement of the great leading doctrines of the Scriptures; which will be no small advantage to any who may have had to enter upon the ministry with but little preparation.

On the same account, this work recommends itself as a most important help to every Bible class and Sabbath school teacher. Indeed, every head of a family who wishes to acquire and impart to his children correct and enlightened views upon religious subjects in general, should have in his library this Encyclopædia. Were this generally the case, we might soon expect to see a higher degree of religious knowledge in circulation, and fewer misconceptions and misrepresentations respecting the sentiments of different religious denominations.'
[Zion's Advocate (Portland).]

'Few works of more value can be named, even in this time of condensing books. For theological students as a book of reference, and as a family book for youths, to which they may devote their evenings, and utilize correct information upon the almost boundless field of survey which is connected with the moral and religious condition of mankind, it is unequalled in variety and amplitude of knowledge. We have extensively searched the articles of which it is composed; and can attest to the general fidelity with which the work has been compiled. We have ascertained that the Ency. of Rel. Knowledge is more than the substance of FIFTY valuable works, all of which formerly were considered necessary to the library not only of a scholar, but also of all Christians who were anxious to obtain accurate and enlarged information of scriptural truth and ecclesiastical history. We can conceive of nothing more beneficial to the American churches than this laborious and grand scheme for the diffusion of religious knowledge.'
[N. Y. Protestant Vindicator.]

(From the Literary and Theological Review, (New York) edited by Rev. Leonard Woods, Jr.)

'It is enough to say in commendation of it, that it fulfils the promise set forth in its long, descriptive, comprehensive title. The original articles contained in it are numerous, and of great value. The mechanical execution is excellent, and the whole constitutes, we have no doubt, the completest and most valuable book of reference, adapted to the use of families, Sunday school teachers, and ministers of the gospel, that has ever been prepared and published in this country.'

(From the New York Observer.)

'This volume is on a plan which we believe to be original, and which cannot fail, if its execution be judicious and faithful, to secure to the work extensive popularity and usefulness. So far as we have examined the articles in the work, with a view to ascertain the value of the skill and fidelity with which it has been executed. The names of several of the original contributors are sufficient to warrant the highest expectations concerning the articles which they have prepared.'

TERMS.

- |  |   |
|--|---|
| I. Each number shall contain at least 32 pages of Engravings and letter-press, royal octavo, printed on paper of the best quality. | III. The price to subscribers will be Fifty cents per No. payable in advance for each three numbers. |
| II. A No. will be issued once in two months, until the work is completed, neatly stitched in a printed cover.                      | IV. The Nos. as published, will be delivered to subscribers by mail or otherwise, free of expense to them.  |

Any person forwarding the names of six subscribers to the publishers, by mail at their expense, and enclosing nine dollars, shall receive the seventh copy gratis.

When completed, the whole will form a beautiful volume, to be bound up by itself to accompany any edition of the Bible, or the Engravings may be inserted in any royal octavo Bible.

N. B. Pictorial Illustrations of the Bible cannot be too highly appreciated, especially those of the character here proposed. They serve materially to illustrate the texts, and, in some cases, are almost indispensable to a right understanding of the subject. They arrest the attention of the young, and serve to impress Scripture scenes and subjects on their memory, while they attract the attention of all to the sacred volume. In scarcely any other way can a person spend the same amount to so much advantage for his family.

that all these (to us) obscure an indefinite denunciations had been— we knew not very well when or how—accomplished: but to have graphic descriptions, ground plans, and elevations, showing the actual existence of all the heretofore vague and shadowy denunciations of God against Edom, does, we confess, excite our feelings, and exalt our confidence in prophecy, to a height that no external evidence has hitherto done. Here we have—bursting upon our rage of incredulity, by the labors of accidental, impartial, and sometimes incredulous (infidel) witnesses—the certainty of existing facts, which fulfil what were considered hitherto the most vague and least intelligible of the prophecies. The value of one such contemporaneous proof is immense." Indeed, it would seem that in regard to such places as Babylon, Nineveh, Tyre, Moab, Edom, and others, the providence of God has been so conspicuous, as to bring to light, in these latter ages, the evidence of the accomplishment of those prophecies, than formerly in working the accomplishment itself. The valuable labors of Keith in this department, arranged in accordance with our general plan, so as to exhibit the commentary under its appropriate text, will be found to have added much to the interest and profit of the reader in perusing his pages.

The numerous highly finished engravings, executed by distinguished artists, from sketches taken on the spot, will go also greatly to enhance the value of this portion of the illustrations.

A critical note is occasionally thrown in, where the point of a passage seemed capable of a happy explication, especially from a more exact analysis of the import of the original terms.

As a prominent object aimed at throughout has been, not only to increase the facilities for a complete understanding of the inspired volume, but also to multiply the evidences, and vindicate the claims of its divine origin, a portion of our pages has been allotted to the direct consideration of infidel objections and cavils. The most important extracts of this description have been taken from the valuable and now rare "Life of David," by Chandler, in which the insinuations of Bayle against the character of David, are canvassed and refuted with distinguished ability, though perhaps somewhat more verbosely than is consistent with the taste either of modern writers or readers.

The original and acute remarks of Michaelis on many points of the Mosaic laws and ritual, though sometimes bordering upon the fanciful, disclose a profound acquaintance with the genius of the East, and are generally entitled to deep attention.

As the authorities employed in the preparation of the ensuing pages are usually quoted in a very general way—for the most part merely by citing the writer's name—it will probably be rendering an important service to many of our readers, to give a more ample conspectus of the sources upon which we have drawn for materials. The list is, however, by no means complete, nor, as many have served us at second hand, is it perhaps practicable or necessary that it should be.

☞ The importance of the present work must be obvious, and being altogether illustrative, without reference to doctrines, or other points in which Christians differ, it is hoped it will meet with favor from all who love the sacred volume, and that it will be sufficiently interesting and attractive to recommend itself, not only to professed Christians of all denominations, but also to the general reader. The arrangement of the texts illustrated with the notes, in the order of the chapters and verses of the authorized version of the Bible, will render it convenient for reference to particular passages, while the copious Index at the end, will at once enable the reader to turn to every subject discussed in the volume.

PUBLISHERS' ADVERTISEMENT.

In presenting the public with another of their Comprehensive volumes, the publishers take the opportunity to acknowledge the favor which their efforts to circulate useful and religious knowledge in a condensed and cheap form have hitherto met with. "THE COMPREHENSIVE COMMENTARY ON THE BIBLE," "THE ENCYCLOPEDIA OF RELIGIOUS KNOWLEDGE," and "THE POLYGLOTT BIBLE" edited by the Rev. Mr. Warne, have met with a sale far surpassing that of any other work of equal magnitude in the United States, or in the world, in the same length of time. The Vermont Chronicle well remarks, that they might be all bound to match, and appropriately entitled,

"THE COMPREHENSIVE LIBRARY OF RELIGIOUS KNOWLEDGE."

Encouraged by the great popularity of those works, the same publishers have been induced to bring forward the present volume, in the hope that it may find equal favor with the public, as they have no doubt that it is equally deserving of it.

It will be seen from a slight examination, that this, like its predecessors, is comprehensive in its character, embracing the substance and value of more than fifteen octavo volumes, together with a great amount of matter illustrative of the Scriptures, drawn from biblical writers, the accounts of oriental travellers, periodicals, &c. &c. (See the Preface for an explanation of the plan and a list of authors quoted.) The value of the materials of which the volume is composed, will be readily seen, and it would be superfluous to remark upon the peculiar qualifications of the editor.

☞ This volume is not designed to take the place of commentaries, but is a distinct department of biblical illustration, and may be used as a companion to the Comprehensive or any other Commentary, or the common Bible.

in the volume, it is believed, will form no small part of its attractions. No pains have been spared to procure such as should embellish the work, and at the same time illustrate the text. Objections that have been made to the pictures commonly introduced into the Bible, as being mere creations of fancy and the imagination, often unlike nature, and frequently conveying false impressions, cannot be urged against the pictorial illustrations of this volume. Here the fine arts are made subservient to utility, the landscape views being, without an exception, MATTER OF FACT views of places mentioned in Scripture, as they appear at the present day; thus in many instances exhibiting in the most forcible manner to the eye, the strict and literal fulfilment of the remarkable prophecies; "the present ruined and desolate condition of the cities of Babylon, Nineveh, Selah, &c., and the countries of Edom and Egypt, are astonishing examples, and so completely descriptive, in the most minute particulars, every thing which was foretold of them in the height of their prosperity, that no better description can now be given of them than a simple quotation from a chapter and verse of the Bible written two or three thousand years ago." The publishers are enabled to select from several collections lately published in London, the proprietor of one of which says, that "several distinguished travellers have afforded him the use of nearly Three Hundred Original Sketches" of Scripture places, made upon the spot. "The land of Palestine, it is well known, abounds in scenes of the most picturesque beauty. Syria comprehends the snowy heights of Lebanon, and the majestic ruins of Tadmor and Baalbec."

The following are some of the principal advantages of the English version of the Polyglott Bible, over other Editions of the Holy Scriptures, with references.

| I. Its originality will preëminently be found to consist in a laborious and entirely new selection and arrangement of References, in which it has been endeavored faithfully to exhibit the Scripture as its own Expositor. The advantages to the sincere reader of the sacred pages, of having constantly before him Marginal References to similar and illustrative passages, are obvious, and fully approved by all. 'It were to be wished,' says bishop Horsley, 'that no Bibles were printed without References. Particular diligence should be used in comparing the parallel texts of the Old and New Testaments. . . . It is incredible,' he adds, 'to any one who has not made the experiment, what a proficiency may be made in that knowledge which maketh wise unto salvation; by studying the Scriptures in this manner, WITHOUT ANY OTHER COMMENTARY, OR EXPOSITION, THAN WHAT THE DIFFERENT PARTS OF THE SACRED VOLUME MUTUALLY FURNISH TO EACH OTHER.' References have, however, heretofore generally been confined either to Bibles of large and unwieldy size, or to those so small as to be useless or inconvenient to people advanced in life. Here is an Edition with References, which, while it is not liable to the objection now almost universally felt, against the inconvenient size and weight of the quarto editions, yet offers in a convenient shape and size, by a judicious arrangement and plan, a type so easily read as that of our largest editions, in the form of an elegant and convenient Family Bible. II. The References and Readings have been prepared with a strict attention to two things—1. That they should not be merely repetitions, but illustrative;—and, 2. That they should not be complex and crowded, and so numerous as to be tedious and forbidding; a fault with those of Scott and others, but that they should be as full as should be deemed useful and necessary, and a MORE APPROPRIATE AND ACCURATE selection, adaptation, and arrangement, than those in any other edition. So that, while no superfluous ones have been admitted, the most material purposes to be answered by references have been effectually secured. III. These References have the advantage of being selected | from many valuable editions and commentaries in different languages. IV. All the Marginal Readings contained in the folio and quarto Bibles are introduced; the idioms of the original languages, and also the various senses of particular words or phrases, being instructive and worthy to be known. V. The advantages of the present arrangement of the references in a middle column, are, that they are more condensed, and yet are plain and easy to be referred to, and are not liable, as those in other editions are, to be cut in binding or worn away by use, nor to be bound so into the back of the book as not to be easily read. VI. The Concordance will be found highly convenient, enabling any one by looking for a word in a verse or chapter, to turn immediately to it. VII. The value of the Introductions to the Bible, and the several books, the Indexes, Gazetteer, the new Tables, Maps, &amp;c. will be readily seen, as they all tend to assist the sincere searcher of the Scriptures, in his inquiries. The Wood Cuts and Engravings are valuable, not merely as embellishing the work, but especially as illustrating scripture manners, customs, phrases, &amp;c. and as attracting the attention of the young. An engraving as illustrative of a particular passage, conveys at once to the eye, and more readily and permanently fixes upon the mind, the meaning of that passage, than a page of comment or explanation. On the whole, the several advantages of the present Edition commend it to the patronage of the community as the best of the publications of the Bible ever offered to them, for compactness and combination of useful matter. Its medium size, not too large for handling with convenience, with large type for the eyes of the aged, are judged to be no trifling recommendations. The Publishers, therefore, look for some considerable portion of public favor towards this enterprise; and they indulge the hope and expectation of obtaining for the Word of God an increased circulation, and, of course, an increased influence. |
